Thames Gateway

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

10.50 pm

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): The Thames riverside to the east of London, beyond docklands, includes parts of Barking, Dagenham, Havering and Thurrock on the north bank, and Greenwich, Bexley and Dartford on the south bank. That is the London Thames gateway.

The area provides one third of all London's jobs—some 900,000—and includes the largest concentration of manufacturing firms in London. A high proportion of local residents—about 60 per cent.—work locally. Major areas of land, amounting to 2,000 hectares, are available for industrial, commercial and residential development. Potentially, it is the greatest area of opportunity within Greater London today.

At each end of the area, major investments are being made in projects of regional and national significance. To the west is the London docklands, including the millennium exhibition site, the dome, which will be served by the Jubilee line extension and an extended docklands light railway. To the east, the first phase of the channel tunnel rail link will end at Ebbsfleet, linking the area quickly and easily with the continent. In addition, two major retail centres have opened—at Lakeside on the north bank and at Bluewater on the south bank—which serve both London and the south-east region generally.

When I look at the potential opportunity, I have a sense of having been here before. In the 1970s, I was privileged to be the first head of the London Docklands development corporation, and was responsible for establishing the organisation, for drawing up the development strategy and for initiating some of the earlier infrastructure. It was the largest area of urban development in the world at that time.

Today, I have the great privilege to represent in Parliament a constituency that is central to a similar major opportunity of national significance in the Thames gateway. The comparison between the London docklands development and the potential of London's Thames gateway is both exhilarating and sobering. It is sobering because many of the obstacles that stand in the way of realising the potential of the Thames gateway are the same as have bedevilled progress in docklands. The political climate of the 1970s made progress in development dependent on huge public sector investments. The economic austerity of the time prevented the Government from making those necessary investments to any great extent, and private investors were then reluctant to make parallel commitments.

The political climate then swung to the other extreme with the change of Government, so that the development was seen as being promoted almost entirely by market forces. However, the transport infrastructure of the area was totally inadequate. An early extension of the Jubilee line through the area was regarded as a prerequisite of private investment throughout the area. The Jubilee line, however, could not be financed through private investment.

The result was that private investors cherry-picked the areas around Wapping and the Surrey docks, while the potential of huge areas downstream was not realised.

Canary Wharf progressed only when the Government became committed to putting in the docklands light railway, and now the Jubilee line. The Greenwich peninsula remained derelict until the millennium dome came along, and the Jubilee line will arrive, there 20 years late, to accompany it.

The point of that analysis is not recrimination. It is to learn lessons, so that we do not repeat earlier mistakes downstream. A major lesson to be learned is that progress does not have to depend on comprehensive public investment in the style of the new towns. Equally, market forces alone will not progress development. There genuinely is a third way, which depends on a firm commitment to public funding to improve transport infrastructure, accessibility and the environment. That will, in turn, provide a favourable basis for essential private investment.

That strategy depends utterly on a firm commitment to spending on infrastructure, either through direct investment, PFI schemes or guarantees to limit the risk of the private investor. A fragmented, haphazard approach to public investment dependent on the state of finance in individual local authorities or public bodies will not generate confidence.

The problems of transport, accessibility and the environment for the Thames gateway area of London are similar to those in the docklands. The river and the relative absence of river crossings in that area, as compared with the equivalent area upstream of Tower bridge, are a major inhibition to the economic development of the area. A recent study by the Government office for London stressed that point, as has every study over the past 20 years, going back to the docklands strategy in the 1970s.

The effect of the river barrier has been to limit the scope of companies to recruit over a wide area, or to move their goods and services to other parts of London. Residents of the riverside wards in Greenwich and Bexley cannot travel easily to job opportunities elsewhere in London, so unemployment there is well above the London average: it is 10.5 per cent. compared with 6.3 per cent.

Environmental objections must not become a veto on enhanced river crossing capacity, or these problems will deepen as the environmental benefit for some blights the economic welfare of many others. A balance between environmental and economic interests must be achieved.

On the south bank of the river in Greenwich and Bexley, the scope for moving goods westward towards the Blackwall tunnel or eastwards towards the M25 and Dover is limited by constrictions and consequential congestion on the road network. Likewise, the limitations of east-west public transport add to road congestion, as employees coming into the area or travelling to jobs elsewhere in the Thames gateway have no alternative but to use their cars.

The recently published study of new crossings sponsored by the Government office for London has made proposals to tackle the deficiency of river crossing capacity in east London. The solution, for which the economic benefit is assessed as double the cost, is to provide a third crossing at the Blackwall tunnel, a bridge over the Thames at Galleons reach for local traffic and a busway, and a rail tunnel at Woolwich capable of taking six trains an hour in each direction between Ebbsfleet, the channel tunnel rail link phase one terminus, and Stratford on the north bank of the river, passing through Bexley and Greenwich and called the Thames gateway metro.

This transport concept also involves introducing and harmonising toll charges between the Blackwall tunnel, the new Thames bridge and the Dartford river crossing. Taken together, this package of three measures could contribute to the regeneration of Greenwich-Bexley Thameside, and deflect passengers to public transport instead of their travelling by car.

Any two elements of the package could be privately financed without public sector support. The third element, which is vital to realising the full impact, would require public funding of about £25 million. That package would not only alleviate the present lack of river crossings, but provide east-west public transport through Greenwich and Bexley by way of the Thames gateway metro between Ebbsfleet and Stratford north of the river, and by way of the bus link over the Thames bridge and along the south Thames development route.

The south Thames development route consists of a combination of the roads A206 and A2016, which are dual carriageway most of the way between Woolwich and the M25, and then goes on to Gillingham. According to the answer to a recent parliamentary question, the Government have invested some £40 million in the route between Woolwich and the M25 in the last 10 years. That reflects the importance of the route for commercial transport into and out of the industrial areas on the south bank of the Thames.

There is just one snag in this grand design—the 1.7 km of the south Thames development route that passes through Crayford, in my constituency. It is still single carriageway, and a major source of congestion. My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Thamesmead (Mr. Austin) and I are regularly lobbied by employers and residents about the slow-moving queues that are adding to their costs. A local conference produced many stories from industrial development agents who had abandoned the idea of locating in the area for that reason alone. I have a list of 50 major employers who have said that they are adversely affected by congestion on this stretch of road.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid), then Minister of Transport, presented his road review to the House in July last year, he agreed that high priority should go to schemes under which an unimproved stretch of road prevents full realisation of the true value of earlier road investment. I doubt whether the Minister could find a better exemplification of that principle than Thames road, Crayford, the 1.7 km stretch of the south Thames development route to which I have referred.

Although the London borough of Bexley put the project at the top of its priority list, the present understanding is that it may be seven to 10 years before the problem is resolved. What is the point of so much earlier investment, if the true benefit is to be delayed for such a protracted period?

I am grateful to the Minister for letting me know of the river crossing proposals to which I have referred. I welcome the intention to safeguard a third Blackwall crossing, and to provide an alignment of the Thames gateway bridge with the Woolwich rail tunnel; but I am dismayed by indications that the Government will now delay progress until the mayor of London and the Greater London Authority are in place.

In a letter written last July, the Minister said that she firmly believed that the whole issue should be left until the Greater London Authority could form a view on it, but there is always some such reason why the time is not ripe. No doubt the Greater London Authority will demand a year or two, or more, to settle in, which probably puts a decision three or more years away.

Timing is important in matters such as this. It is bad government that causes people to await the convenience of the governors. All public and private-sector partners in both the Thames gateway London partnership and the Bexley Thameside partnership have written to the Minister to confirm their need for work on the proposals now.

There have been two undesirable features of this country's planning and urban development arrangements. The first is a mañana mentality, leading to institutionalised procrastination. The second—despite the good intentions of planners—is a piecemeal approach to opportunities when success demands concurrent action on several fronts.

The Thames gateway in London offers an opportunity for urban regeneration, which depends on public action on transport, public services and the environment, and on commercial action to provide jobs, housing and many other features of life in the 21st century. At present, general good intentions are expressed by public authorities and there are outline plans for a river crossing and east-west public transport. We have no idea when any of that will come about. All the signs are that the Blackwall tunnel's third crossing, the rail tunnel at Woolwich, the metro line, the bridge at Galleons reach and work on Thames road, Crayford will be handled by different public authorities, piecemeal and without any concerted timetable.

It may be that, for financial reasons, the timetable for infrastructure projects will be longer than many people would like, but any timetable that expressed a commitment that investors could believe in would be better than a "this year, next year, some time, never" approach. I ask the Minister to recognise that a piecemeal, project-by-project approach to regenerate the Thames gateway in London, with no commitment to a target date for completion, will fail. It will not give private investors sufficient confidence in the future of the area for them to make commitments.

Conversely, my appeal is for a concerted programme of infrastructure projects such as I have outlined to be drawn up with firm commitments to finance and timing. Work on the programme could be started now and presented to the mayor and Greater London Authority for ratification, or amendment on completion. There is no reason why the mayor and the authority should be an excuse for delay. Nor are the amounts of public money that are needed large.

Above all, let those projects be looked at as a package contributing to the economic regeneration of the area. Let them not be seen narrowly as isolated road, rail or tunnelling schemes. Success in realising the true potential of the Thames gateway in London depends on joined-up government delivering joined-up action on time.

11.7 pm

The Minister for Transport in London (Ms Glenda Jackson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) on obtaining the Adjournment debate and on affording the House the opportunity to consider the issue. The House has been particularly fortunate because he has such direct experience of both the area and the issues inherent within Thames gateway.

As I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, the Government actively support Thames gateway as a priority regeneration corridor. The sub-region's potential for growth and investment is widely recognised.

Thames gateway can boast a number of particularly important development schemes, where much needed investment on brown-field sites is delivering key London facilities and much needed new resources. At the royal docks, a new exhibition and conference centre is under construction. A new university campus is to open in September.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, Greenwich peninsula is the home not only of the dome, but of the millennium village. It is the site of a major public transport interchange, including North Greenwich station, which is part of the Jubilee line extension, and a major bus interchange. The pier at the dome will enable river buses to serve what was formerly the site of a gas works.

Greenwich peninsula is now a site of national importance, representing significant Government commitment to the sub-region. As I am sure my hon. Friend is aware, the Jubilee line extension is already serving the peninsula.

There are many other examples of real activity in Thames gateway. Together, they are creating momentum to bring about lasting change, but we acknowledge that more is yet to be done. Barriers to development still exist. Contamination on sites, weak infrastructure and excluded communities remain. However, the Government are committed to ensuring continued change, both in physical and social terms, for the benefit of London, local communities and the wider sub-region.

On 15 July, there were two important announcements for Thames gateway. The single regeneration budget, SRB5, has brought significant new funding to the region. At least £33 million has been allocated for SRB5 projects within the primary Thames gateway regeneration areas—a real injection of funding to ensure that the benefits of new investment are realised in both the short and long terms.

The proposed assisted area map provided further good news, retaining Thames gateway wards within the eligible areas to apply for regional selective assistance. That will create and safeguard jobs, attract inward investment and contribute to regional competitiveness.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, transport improvements play a key role in the regeneration of Thames gateway. An extensive programme of improvements is under way to enable strategic accessibility to the area and to sites of potential major development. That will make Thames gateway a source of employment and a more effective competitor for business.

Phase 1 of the channel tunnel rail link is now under way. I am sure that hon. Members will recall that the positive regeneration impact of the link was a fundamental consideration in securing the project. It will consolidate the area's role as the gateway to Europe for London and the United Kingdom, and it will provide a new economic role for the area on which to build future development growth.

The first phase of the Jubilee line extension is already open, as I have said. Phases 2 and 3 will follow in the summer and in the autumn. The new docklands light railway extension to Lewisham is due to be in service shortly, and planned further extensions to the DLR will include access to City airport. An extensive bus network, providing high-quality public transport north and south of the river, is being explored by London Transport, in conjunction with local boroughs. As I have said, under this Government the River Thames is being brought into play as part of the capital's transport network.

The new stretch of the A13 has been opened, linking Dagenham to the M25. Also, the go-ahead has been given to the design, build, finance and operate plans for the A13, as part of the trunk roads programme. Collectively, these projects represent a major investment by the Government in providing Thames gateway with the integrated transport system that it requires to achieve its economic and regeneration goals.

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): When does the Minister expect that the Stratford interchange of the channel tunnel rail link will be ready? The link will benefit not only the Thames gateway, but the whole of Essex and East Anglia.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be aware that the first phase of the channel tunnel rail link is on time and on budget. The requirement is that for the whole line to be built, so I cannot give a specific date for the completion of the Stratford interchange. However, I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no doubt that it will be completed.

The Government have also taken the lead in exploring the scope for developing additional crossings across the River Thames, east of the Blackwall tunnel, to assist still further with the regeneration objective. We are aware of the strong interest among local communities in securing additional crossings, and of the importance of accessibility in opening up new business, employment and leisure markets in the area. That is why we made reference to the potential value of an integrated package of new crossings in our integrated transport White Paper, published last year.

A package of crossings has been developed, based on the appraisal of a number of different options against a specially commissioned appraisal framework. The Government have decided that the responsibility for determining the form of a crossings package should lie with the new mayor of London.

The mayor has regeneration, transport and planning responsibilities for London and will be in the ideal position to assess the most suitable integrated outcome. My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford stressed the importance of adopting a comprehensive approach to the programme and of avoiding a fragmented approach, with different crossings subject to separate and piecemeal proposals. It was precisely to facilitate an integrated approach, both to the planning and funding of the final strategy, that the decision was taken.

To enable the mayor to reach a decision on the future of the crossings as quickly as possible, further development work is being co-ordinated. The Government have safeguarded the most promising alignment for each crossing. London First is exploring, with private sector partners, the scope for its participation in the programme. London Transport, together with docklands light railway and Railtrack, is examining the feasibility of a DLR-based crossing to Woolwich. English Partnerships has undertaken a study of the regeneration implications and benefits of the crossings package. It is now considering the appointment of a project manager to orchestrate the work appropriate to this interim period.

I trust that it is clear, therefore, that the project continues to be taken forward in a sensible and practical way, which matches current circumstances. I am sorry that our decision has caused my hon. Friend dismay, but it is important that decisions taken now do not pre-empt the mayor's choice, either in the final form of the crossings or the financial structures put in place to secure them. I am certain that the approach adopted by the Government will achieve the most satisfactory and secure outcome to this important but complex issue.

My hon. Friend focused on a short section of Thames road, which he has highlighted as the only single carriageway section of the south Thames development route in Bexley. He also referred to the findings of a recently published study sponsored by the Government office for London. The south Thames development route could play an important role in any strategy which arises from this study. Certainly that could lead to improved public transport links on this section of Thames gateway.

I understand that the London borough of Bexley is keen to develop the case for this road scheme in its interim transport plan. In the event, it would certainly wish to focus on the regeneration benefits for Thames gateway and any potential contribution to improved transport integration. However, my hon. Friend will appreciate that it would be wrong of me to go further than that in prejudging the merits, or otherwise, of the Bexley interim transport plan.

As I said in my opening remarks, the House has been privileged to hear the wealth of detail, stemming from direct experience, which my hon. Friend brought to this evening's debate. He detailed the overwhelming importance of the development of the Thames gateway, not only economically and environmentally, but socially. I reassure him that the Government share his appreciation of the importance of Thames gateway.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes past Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Gold

1. Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): What the difference was between the money the Treasury received from the recent sale of gold and the purchase price of that gold. [91091]

2. Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): How much gold from the National Reserves he will sell next month. [91092]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Continuing the policy of the previous Government, this Government have accepted the principle of gold sales and have therefore continued to support the sale of International Monetary Fund gold to fund debt relief for the poorest countries.

In order to achieve a balanced portfolio of our national reserves, we will sell 125 tonnes of gold this year by the preannouncement and phasing of sales. There will be no sales of gold in August.

In answer to the first part of the question asked by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), most of the gold held in our reserves was acquired before 1950 at a purchase price of $35 an ounce or less. Therefore, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's detailed question, the 25 tonnes of gold sold on 6 July would have been purchased for a notional $30 million or less. The gold was sold for $209 million, which makes a cash profit of more than $170 million.

Mr. Burns: I am slightly surprised that the Chancellor did not give the figures in updated terms. Does the Chancellor accept that, between 7 May and the present, the price of gold per ounce has fallen from $287 to $254? That means that, as a result of the sale, every man, woman and child in this country has paid £10. Does the Chancellor think that the gold sale on 6 July helped or hindered the national interest? Given the fall in the gold price and the uncertainty in the gold market as a result of his announcement, will he postpone or put on hold future sales?

Mr. Brown: The answer to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's question is no. The mistake was made by the previous Government. When the price of gold was valued at anything between $300 and $800 per ounce, they took no action while other countries around the world were rebalancing their assets portfolios. Although the hon. Gentleman complains about the British sale, over the past few years, Australia, Austria, Canada, the Netherlands, Belgium and Switzerland have been selling their gold portfolios. Canada has sold 500 tonnes, the Netherlands has sold 700, Belgium has sold 707 and Switzerland plans to sell 1,300. We plan to sell 125 tonnes this year.

If the hon. Gentleman wants to take up the case of South Africa, I must inform him that it has halved its gold assets in the past 20 years and it sold more gold last year than we will sell this year. Those are the facts of the position. It is about time the Conservative party looked at the facts instead of being opportunistic in this matter.

Mr. Fabricant: Have not the Government achieved a double whammy not only by trumpeting the sales of gold as the price has fallen, but by saying that 40 per cent. of the sale proceeds will be used to purchase euros? Although the euro rallied slightly this morning and, as the Chancellor will know, is currently valued at $1.0535, is he not aware that the value may fall again in three or four months? What is his estimate of the value of the euro in three, four or six months or a year?

Mr. Brown: There is no change in the balance of our portfolio between euros, dollars and yen. The hon. Gentleman, who was a Parliamentary Private Secretary at the Treasury, should know that the Chancellor whom he served supported the principle of gold sales in relation to the IMF. We will take no lectures about the use of the national reserves from the party that, when in power, lost £4 billion in a day on Black Wednesday 1992.

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As the Chancellor refused to answer my question about the value of the euro, I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I must move to the next question.

Windfall Tax

3. Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): What evaluation he has undertaken of the use made of the windfall tax on the privatised utilities. [91093]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Madam Speaker—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Let me explain to the House what has happened. When an hon. Member says that he intends to raise a question on the Adjournment, I must end the exchanges and move on.

Mr. Brown: The windfall tax, which raised £5.2 billion, has enabled the Government to embark upon the new deal—the biggest ever programme to get the unemployed into work. More than 284,000 people have now entered the new deal through the young person's scheme and almost 100,000 long-term unemployed have entered the scheme. The windfall tax has also enabled the Government to inject much-needed capital investment into more than 10,000 schools. We will launch the new deal for the over-50s in the autumn. Therefore, we will continue to expand the new deal over the next few months.

Mr. Clapham: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply, which shows clearly that the windfall tax has been used to create hope and opportunity for tens of thousands of young people. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we are to reach the Government's objective of eliminating child poverty within the next 20 years, we must complement what has been done at regional and local levels in areas such as Barnsley where the average income per household on council estates is between £5,000 and £6,000 and 34 per cent. of children come from families that are in receipt of family credit or income support? Does he agree that we need more opportunity, greater equality and further redistribution of wealth if we are to eliminate child poverty and remedy the neglect that the Tory party inflicted on older industrial areas?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is absolutely right—when we came into power in 1997, a third of our children were in low-income families and 40 per cent. of children were being born into low-income families. That is why the first thing that we had to do was to create new job opportunities for the unemployed. That is why, with nearly 600,000 more people in work and nearly 300,000 young people involved in the new deal, we are creating working opportunities for families in this country.

As my hon. Friend rightly says, the second challenge is to make work pay, and it is very surprising that the Conservative party still opposes the new deal, the minimum wage and the working families tax credit. On every issue, it is on the wrong side for the needs of working families, and I hope that at some point the shadow Chancellor will withdraw his remark that the new deal is

"a waste of public money and a fraud perpetrated upon a great many people."—[Official Report, 4 November 1998; Vol. 318, c. 881.]

The fraud is what the Conservatives perpetrated on the unemployed.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): How can the Chancellor have the gall to stand there and say that the windfall tax and the new deal have been a success? How many genuine jobs at full pay have been created? How much do those jobs cost? What will the Chancellor do in two years, when the windfall tax revenue will have run out?

Mr. Brown: There are 100,000 young people now in jobs. If only one young person had got a job, that would be satisfactory, but 100,000 young people are now in work. I should have thought that despite party politics, the hon. Gentleman would welcome the fact that there are more people in jobs.

On the use of the windfall fund, we have a new deal not only for young people, but for the long-term unemployed and single parents, and in October we shall introduce a new deal for the over-50s. If anybody considers the cost of unemployment under the Conservative Government, they will realise that the introduction of a windfall tax to get people back to work is the best use of public money.

The Conservatives' problem is not only that they opposed the new deal, but that they opposed the windfall tax, which was the right measure to take revenue from companies that had made excess profits as a result of the unfair privatisations and to use it to get people back to work.

Financial Services

4. Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): What steps he is taking to ensure that people in poorer communities have access to financial services. [91094]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Following the publication of the report of the social exclusion unit, "Bringing Britain Together", we established two policy action teams, led by the Treasury to consider the problem of financial exclusion. We have involved community groups, credit unions, banks and buildings societies in their work and we expect to publish their reports and action plans in the autumn.

Mr. Plaskitt: Does my hon. Friend welcome the new duty imposed on the Financial Services Authority to perform an educational role? Does she agree that it should seek to concentrate its efforts on people with lower incomes, who have not previously had access to financial services? Does she further agree that the impact of the national minimum wage and the forthcoming working families tax credit will give lower-income families far greater opportunities to draw on financial services? Do not all those measures extend financial opportunity to the many, as opposed to the few?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right on both points. First, the Financial Services Authority has an important role to play in spreading information among all sections of consumers, particularly those on low incomes. Secondly, the Conservative party is opposed to the minimum wage, the working families tax credit and the new deal for the unemployed. In other words, the Conservatives would make the poor even poorer while a Labour Government are delivering opportunities and social inclusion for all.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): While we are on the subject of poor communities, does the hon. Lady think that the Chancellor understands that his decision to sell our gold has plunged South Africa into crisis, and only today 2,500 Ghanaian miners have been laid off, and they and their many dependants have been plunged into abject poverty? Is that a good way to help poor communities throughout the Commonwealth?

Ms Hewitt: I quite understand that the hon. Gentleman's question and the question that the shadow Chancellor was planning to ask about gold sales were destroyed by friendly fire. I do not really think that the hon. Gentleman can get them out of that hole.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made the position on gold sales absolutely clear. We are continuing the policy of the previous Government, to support gold sales by the International Monetary Fund in order to help to relieve the debt burden of the poorest people in the poorest communities—because, unlike the Conservative party, we are determined to deliver opportunity and security, and to help the poorest people, whether in our own country or in the poorest countries of the world.

Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): I thank my hon. Friend for meeting a delegation of community-based credit unions the other week. She knows the concerns that they raised about the balance between community-based credit unions and other credit unions. Will she give us an undertaking to ensure that the balance is redressed and that community-based credit unions are supported?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend has taken a long-standing interest in this matter. I entirely agree that credit unions have a very important role to play, especially in the most disadvantaged communities. We have some very successful credit unions in this country, such as the one that I recently visited at Speke in Liverpool, but they could obviously play a much larger role in helping to combat financial exclusion.

We shall shortly publish the report of the task force chaired by Fred Goodwin of the Royal Bank of Scotland, on how banks and building societies can help promote credit unions throughout the country, but especially in the poorest areas.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): Following the Chancellor's eloquent comments in the Daily Mail earlier this week about the abuses in the mortgage market, is the hon. Lady aware of the disappointment at the fact that the Government continue to disregard the advice of the Treasury Committee and the Treasury Joint Committee on the Financial Services and Markets Bill that mortgages should be brought within statutory regulation and not allowed to remain within the self-regulating framework of the very institutions that are abusing the market?

Ms Hewitt: I know that the hon. Gentleman was not always able to attend meetings of the Joint Committee, but I think that he will be aware that, earlier this week, we published a consultation document on whether the sale of all mortgage products and advice on those products should be brought within the scope of the new Financial Services Authority. As we said then, we shall decide on the scope of the Financial Services and Markets Bill, and in particular the issue of mortgage regulation, before the end of the year, but we shall do so following proper consultation, and following a proper cost-benefit analysis, so that we can ensure that we get the best possible deal for every consumer and home buyer.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): I am pleased by the focus that we have had this morning on credit unions, but will my hon. Friend admit that credit unions in this country have tighter restrictions than those in Australia and other countries? Are the Government considering relaxing those restrictions so that credit unions may expand, as they have in several countries?

On a different subject, do the Government look favourably on the expansion or development of local exchange trading schemes?

Ms Hewitt: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for raising both those points. We have already issued proposals for a deregulation order that would improve the capacity and the ability of credit unions to offer wider services, for instance by enabling them to bring into membership people who work in a specific area as well as those who live in it. We are currently considering the responses to that consultation.

We are also considering in the social exclusion policy action teams the role that LETS can play, especially in helping unemployed people to develop skills that may be useful to them on returning to work.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Does the Economic Secretary agree that one way of making financial services less accessible to people would be to put VAT on them? Will she therefore comment on the fact that, with the Treasury's knowledge and consent, Customs and Excise is engaged in discussions organised by the European Commission about extending VAT to financial services? To prevent the Government getting into the same muddle on this as they have on the withholding tax, where they are led along into damaging negotiations, will she make it clear now, in advance, that the Government will veto any attempt to extend VAT to things such as credit cards, bank charges or mortgages, and will she give that categorical assurance now, in advance of the negotiations, which are already under way?

Ms Hewitt: I am astonished by the right hon. Gentleman's ability to see European conspiracies even in a question about financial exclusion and credit unions. I remind him that it was the Conservative Government who imposed value added tax on fuel and who would have increased it to 17½ per cent. had we not stopped them and brought the rate down. It is a disgrace for the right hon. Gentleman to try to divert attention from what we are doing to promote competition in financial services and to ensure that the poorest people have access to mainstream financial services.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the consultation paper to which my hon. Friend referred include any reference to rates of interest paid on building society deposits, which many low-income families are very much dependent upon?

Ms Hewitt: The consultation document to which I referred deals with many of the problems that consumers have raised with us and with others in relation to mortgages. My hon. Friend will be aware of many of those problems, including the danger of lock-in periods, high financial penalties and the bundling of some mortgages with expensive home-and-contents insurance policies. The best way to deal with interest rates on both mortgages and on savings deposits is to ensure that there is healthy competition within a well-regulated banking and financial services sector. That is precisely what we are delivering through the Financial Services and Markets Bill. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has recently invited Mr. Don Cruickshank to conduct a special review of competition within the banking sector.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Having grown up on a road where there was no bank, I know how people always look to the Post Office for savings and other services. I welcome the Minister's statement on credit unions. Given that consultation is taking place, may I suggest that she does not give too much credit to those who might be opposing credit unions because they have vested interests? I have seen how credit unions have freed many small, poor communities and given them more liberty in spending.

Ms Hewitt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. I happily assure him that we will not allow any vested interests to stand in the way of the development of credit unions and other services for low-income areas. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the announcement that the Government made in May about computerisation of the Post Office network.

As we modernise Post Office Counters Ltd. so it will be able to offer efficient banking and financial services to everybody within the communities that it serves, including rural and deprived communities. It will be able to do that in partnership with banks and building societies, which may in the past have withdrawn their branches from rural and deprived communities.

VAT (Buildings)

5. Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): If he will reduce the level of value added tax charged on works undertaken to existing buildings. [91096]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): No. European Community agreements prevent us from bringing in a general reduced rate of VAT for works to all existing buildings.

Mr. Russell: I am disappointed by the Minister's response to what was meant to be a friendly question supporting the Deputy Prime Minister's document entitled, "Towards an Urban Renaissance". It would seem that it is not getting the support of the Treasury team. I wonder whether the Treasury and Treasury Ministers have bothered to read what has been proposed in the document. Given the hon. Lady's answer about value added tax, does she agree or disagree with some of the conclusions in "Towards an Urban Renaissance"? One passage states:

"We propose removing the anomaly whereby renovation work on empty dwellings carries Value Added Tax . . . at a punitive 17.5% . . . but new housebuilding" is exempt. The paragraph continues:

"Ideally, refurbishment and conversion work should be zero-rated . . . we would propose applying the minimum rate of 5% VAT to all housebuilding and conversion. A significant proportion of the extra revenue raised should then be used to fund regeneration and development on recycled land."

Madam Speaker: Order. That was far too long a quotation.

Dawn Primarolo: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reading to me a report which I have already seen. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer met Lord Rogers yesterday. The urban task force's report is being considered carefully by the Treasury. Our response will be in the urban White Paper. I am a little surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not more familiar with VAT legislation, and particularly the prevention of returning to a zero rate.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I thank my hon. Friend for her answer. The full version of the report is even better than the appendix. I urge her to bring VAT rates for new build into line with rates for existing buildings. That is the key issue, not the rate itself, and it is urgently needed to ensure the proper allocation of housing on brown-field sites, rather than relying, as we do too heavily, on green-field sites.

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend is right. The Government want to encourage sustainable housing growth. We must carefully consider what role tax will play in encouraging such growth. Lord Rogers's recommendations are being carefully studied.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Despite her risibly unsatisfactory answer to the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell), does the Paymaster General recognise the potential merit of the proposal made in February 1999—by the European Commission, curiously enough—for the imposition of lower rates of VAT on labour-intensive services? As her right hon. Friend the Chancellor is the heaviest plunderer of the pockets of the British people in the country's history, why does she not consider supporting that proposal, as it stands or in a suitably amended form?

Dawn Primarolo: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the proposals for an experimental reduced rate which are being discussed in the European Union are intended to reduce unemployment, and as he knows, unemployment in his constituency has gone down by 33 per cent. since the general election. It is the Government's view that in order to reduce unemployment, we should pursue the policies of skills development, job creation and a stable economy, which the Conservative Government did not pursue. With regard to those discussions, it is our view that they will not contribute to a reduction in unemployment, but we will study the proposals from member states for taking the matter forward.

Working Families Tax Credit

6. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): How he will monitor the impact of the working families tax credit on incomes within families. [91097]

7. Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): What progress he has made with the implementation of the working families tax credit. [91099]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Our aim is that every child should have the best possible start in life. The working families tax credit will be implemented in October this year, including the new, generous child care tax credit. It will benefit nearly 1.5 million families, almost twice as many as under the old system of family credit, and about 3 million children. It will provide a minimum guaranteed income for a family with someone in full-time work of £200 a week—£80 more than the family would receive on income support. On average, families will gain £24 a week, and that will make work pay.

Together with the national minimum wage, the largest ever increase in child benefit, and the reform of taxation in national insurance and in income tax, the working families tax credit will lift about 800,000 children out of poverty.

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank my right hon. Friend for all the measures that he has taken to help low-paid workers while they are bringing up their families, including the working families tax credit, which will benefit 150,000 people in my region. As my right hon. Friend pointed out, if the Conservatives got their way, it would mean a £24 a week tax increase for each of those families.

I am concerned that my right hon. Friend should ensure that his generosity does not get stuck in the pockets of fathers, and that it reaches children and their mothers. Will he ensure that there is independent evaluation of the distribution of his generosity within families, so that it gets to children and their mothers?

Mr. Brown: I thank my hon. Friend. We will have a monitoring system to see how the working families tax credit works. If there is a dispute about who should get the credit, it will normally be paid to the main carer. My hon. Friend is right. At the next election the Conservative party will have to defend its proposal for a tax rise of £24 a week for 1.5 million of the poorest people in the country. Even now, the Conservatives should desist from their opposition to a measure that will relieve family poverty, make work pay, increase child care and deal with the poverty traps.

Mr. Savidge: I welcome the extent to which the working families tax credit will help to tackle the appalling legacy of scandalous levels of child poverty that we inherited from the Conservative Government. Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the Conservative party not just for that legacy, but for their continuing opposition to the measure?

Mr. Brown: I would have hoped that the measure could be supported by all parties in the House, but it is now clear that not only does the Conservative party oppose the working families tax credit, and the shadow Chancellor say that it means state dependency when it is about the dignity of work and helping children, but the Conservative party now even opposes the advertising campaign which is designed to achieve the take-up of the new benefit that we want to see.

The previous Conservative Government spent £21 million advertising the British Gas sale, £36 million advertising the British Telecom sale and £60 million advertising water and electricity sales, but they cannot bring themselves to support the spending of £12 million to advertise a benefit to 1.5 million of the poorest families in Britain. The country will draw the right conclusions from that.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Ministers will be aware that, on 26 January this year, the CBI said that the working families tax credit will be a "new burden" for companies, and that the costs will be significant, especially for small companies. What evidence does the Treasury have for thinking that the CBI is wrong?

Mr. Brown: I have spoken to representatives of all the small business organisations in the past few weeks about the implementation of the working families tax credit, and they have been involved in discussing its implementation. Mr. Stan Menden, of the Forum of Private Business, says:

"The delivery of tax credits through payroll is clearly more effective than direct state handouts in freeing the labour market and reducing dependency and the cost of welfare."

It was a former director general of the CBI who proposed the measure in the first place.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the Chancellor accept that one way of helping to relieve the problems of the working poor is to raise the level at which people start paying tax, which would remove the necessity for many of them to receive the working families tax credit? Will the right hon. Gentleman give a commitment that he will raise the tax threshold at the earliest opportunity to take minimum wage earners out of tax altogether and, subsequently, bring it up to the levels that applied at the end of the war when one could earn 50 per cent. of the average wage before paying tax rather than the 25 per cent. today?

Mr. Brown: We are in the 1990s, not in 1945, and we must devise a system to make work pay that is relevant to the changes in the 1990s. If I recall correctly, the hon. Gentleman's proposal, designed, no doubt, to solicit votes in the Liberal Democrat leadership election, would cost about £20 billion. Our proposal takes many more people out of poverty, helps to make work pay, deals with the problem of inadequate child care and tackles the poverty trap. I should have thought that it would benefit the hon. Gentleman's campaign to become leader of the Liberal Democrats if he supported our proposal.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I congratulate the Chancellor on the historic achievement of the working families tax credit, but he will know that some families will not gain as much as they might because of the steep rates of housing benefit withdrawal as income rises. Will the Chancellor guarantee that, for the Treasury, housing benefit reform should take place as soon as possible, that there should be no losers apart from those who are guilty of fraud and that those moving into work should be substantial gainers, so that the great advances of the working families tax credit are not clawed back by the steep withdrawal of housing benefit?

Mr. Brown: A housing policy review is taking place under my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, but my hon. Friend should not go away with the impression that people are losing out as a result of the working families tax credit. Many families will be £50 a week better off as a result of measures that we are introducing. On average, the benefits are £24 a week. That is going to exactly those groups of people whom he would want to see benefit from the measure—mothers who want to work, and people in low-paid families who were deprived under the previous Government not only of the minimum wage but of an adequate system of family credit. My hon. Friend could help us to put the message across throughout the country that this is a benefit that helps exactly those people who were denied help under the previous Government.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): Does the Chancellor think it matters that he has been condemned by the CBI, by the Institute of Directors and by the Federation of Small Businesses for turning employers into unpaid benefit officers? As the CBI has said, costs are particularly great for small businesses, which are always hardest hit by red tape. Does any of that matter to him or is he going to brush it all aside as he usually does?

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman was stuck after failing to ask his question about gold, so he has repeated one that I have already answered. The Forum of Private Business has made its views clear and the CBI was originally involved in a proposal that would have led to the introduction of a working families tax credit. The right hon. Gentleman is opposing a proposal that even Ronald Reagan in the United States of America was prepared to support.

Under the previous Conservative Government, whom the right hon. Gentleman supported, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), the former Secretary of State for Social Services, wrote in his book "Ministers Decide" that "our original proposal was that Family Credit should be paid through the pay-packet. This had a number of advantages. It brought tax and benefit closer together, and putting family credit explicitly on the pay-slip showed total new earnings—demonstrating . . . the gap between take-home wages and unemployment pay."

He wrote that, after right-wing Conservative opposition,

"with some regret we eventually changed our proposal".

There are even members of the right hon. Gentleman's own party who wish that they had done what we are doing.

Mr. Maude: There were a lot of disadvantages to the proposal, which is why the Conservative Government did not introduce it. It is a scandal that the Chancellor is abolishing the system of family credit which the Conservatives introduced. Only this Chancellor could defend as helping the poor a measure that extends social security benefits to top-rate taxpayers.

Is not the working families tax credit yet another burden that has been imposed on business by a Government who claim to be the friend of business? Yet again, they say one thing and do another. On top of £30 billion of extra stealth taxes and £5 billion a year in costs for extra regulations—on the Government's own figures—businesses face a new energy tax and a new attack on information technology and other entrepreneurs. Is it any wonder that Britain has already slipped from fourth to eighth in the world competitiveness league? Is it surprising that the price of all that extra red tape has been calculated as more than 800,000 jobs? As always under Labour, the poor will suffer most.

Mr. Brown: The one group that the right hon. Gentleman did not mention in his diatribe is the working families whom the measure is designed to help. We are cutting the poverty trap that we inherited from the previous Government; we are tackling the problem of child care, which they never even bothered to address; we are dealing with the problem of making work pay; and we are dealing with the problem of child poverty in this country. It is unfortunate that the dividing line between us and the Conservatives is that we support a minimum wage; a working families tax credit; helping people who receive child benefit; helping pensioners through the £100 winter allowance; and allocating £40 billion for health and education—all central measures that will help working families—while the Conservative party is more extreme than ever in its opposition to anything that will help either the working poor or middle-income families in this country.

Local Government Finance

8. Laura Moffatt (Crawley): What assessment he has made of the effect of the borrowing requirements of local authorities in the next financial year on his plans for fiscal and monetary stability. [91100]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alan Milburn): Local authority spending levels, including borrowing requirements, were taken into account in last year's three-year spending settlement. The resulting levels of public expenditure are reflected in the Government's plans for fiscal and monetary stability.

Laura Moffatt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that good Labour authorities such as Crawley borough council will benefit most from fiscal stability? Such authorities managed to build houses for rent through the lean Tory years. They are still delivering good services and are regularly congratulated by the Audit Commission. Now Crawley borough council will have the stability that it needs to move forward and deliver even better services to the people of Crawley.

Mr. Milburn: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend is right and I pay tribute to the work of Crawley borough council, which is obviously a well-managed and well-run local authority. We have made additional resources available for local government and for our public services. The comprehensive spending review settlement for local government included a doubling in schools investment, an extra £3.5 billion of capital receipts for housing, £700 million more for local authority transport services, £800 million more for the new deal for communities and £2.3 billion through a reshaped single regeneration budget. All those measures will help to modernise our public services to give people in areas such as my hon. Friend's a better deal. They would all be threatened by the Conservatives' spending plans, because the Conservatives are interested in cutting back public spending whereas we are interested in investing in them.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that he has effectively cut services in sectors such as social services, education and police throughout North Yorkshire? Does he not also understand that he has subscribed to the economic convergence criteria, so beloved of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which are set out in the Maastricht treaty, and that the Government should therefore be discouraging public sector borrowing requirements by all local authorities?

Mr. Milburn: We have a further split in the Conservative party: there are divisions not only among those on the Front Bench, but between Back Benchers and Front Benchers. The Back Benchers want to spend more money and the Front Benchers want to spend less—less money for vital public services with the Conservatives and more with the Labour Government.

EU Economic Convergence

9. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What estimate he has made of the rate at which the UK economy has achieved sustained convergence with other EU countries since his statement to the House in October 1997. [91101]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have said that there is no realistic prospect of the UK economy demonstrating, before the end of the current Parliament, convergence that is sustainable and settled rather than transitory. We have put in place policies for economic stability that have delivered low inflation and the lowest interest rates for more than 30 years, but the biggest threat to economic stability and to convergence would be a return to Conservative policies of boom and bust.

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. Lady acknowledge that one of the principal causes of the accelerating divergence of the UK economy from the continental cycle is the historic and growing ownership of assets in the United States by UK companies, and of assets in the UK by United States companies? What does the hon. Lady intend to do about the coincidence of managerial decision making and culture to which that gives rise? Does she intend to introduce measures to restrict the ownership and purchase of such assets, in the same way as she has assisted the European Union in its assault on the transatlantic art market?

Ms Hewitt: Like so many Conservative Members, the hon. Gentleman seems to forget that 50 per cent. of our trade is with the European Union, but we have no need whatever to choose between our close relationship with the EU and our close relationship with the United States of America. I had hoped that he would congratulate the Government on the consequences of our policy of economic stability and growth, which has delivered a 39.6 per cent. reduction in unemployment in his constituency. We took the decision to make the Bank of England independent to secure economic stability and low interest rates. The Conservatives have opposed independence for the Bank of England, just as they have opposed all our other policies for growth and stability.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): Does my hon. Friend agree that the granting of operational independence to the Bank of England has brought the greatest economic stability in this country in a generation? Will she confirm that she will resist the demands from the Conservative party to move away from operational independence?

On the specific issue of the single currency, does my hon. Friend agree that it is right and proper that we continue to monitor convergence and the degree to which we are meeting the criteria that we set for entry? It is right that, if we meet those criteria, we let the people decide the issue in a referendum. It would be totally wrong to give in to the Conservative party and to accept the demand that, whatever the circumstances and the national economic interest, we will not let the people decide the issue for an arbitrary period of 10 years.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. We took the tough decision to give the Bank of England operational independence. Every month for the past two years, the Conservative party has denigrated and opposed that decision. It will have no credibility left if it now tries to pretend that it is in favour of that policy. On the question of joining the single currency, the reality is that the Conservative party is now so extreme and so anti-European that it would oppose joining a single currency, even if it were good for the British economy, for business and for jobs.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): We have had some more bad examples this morning of the Government cooking the figures and trying to spin away the facts, not least in a thoroughly disreputable answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) about gold sales. Had the Chancellor—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Davies: Had the Chancellor quoted the sale price and the purchase price in constant prices—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must resume his seat when I am on my feet. He must also keep within the terms of the question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Davies: I am asking the Government how they will cook the figures or spin away the facts in comparing the growth rates in this country with those in the rest of the European Union. How will they explain away the fact that, in the last five years of the previous Parliament, we consistently had a higher growth rate than the rest of the EU, while this year and next year we shall have a lower growth rate than the EU average?

Ms Hewitt: The fact that the hon. Gentleman cannot explain away is that he is in favour of Britain's membership of the EU, while his Front-Bench colleague, the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight), is against it and wants to withdraw. The divisions on the Conservative Front Bench on this issue will damage the national interest. This Government have delivered economic stability and the lowest interest rates for more than 30 years.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Did my hon. Friend have a chance to read the remarkable article in the Financial Times two weeks ago, which reported the shadow Chancellor as saying that the euro would be a success? Has she noticed that, since that speech, the euro has gone up? Will she encourage the right hon. Gentleman to make more such speeches and unleash the passionate pro-euro feelings of the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies), who, every time he opens his mouth at the Dispatch Box, sees the euro go up and converge with the pound? His great dream of entering the single market will then come about sooner than he hopes.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes his point quite brilliantly. It is highly appropriate that the shadow Chancellor—the man who signed the Maastricht treaty—should now apparently be responsible for a rise in the value of the euro.

Savings Ratio

10. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): What estimate he has made of the savings ratio in 1999–2000. [91102]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alan Milburn): The March 1999 Budget showed the savings ratio rising to 7.5 per cent. in 1999 and beyond.

Mr. Syms: Will the Minister apologise for the vicious attack that the Government have launched against savers: the £5 billion that they are taking out of pension funds; and the abolition of personal equity plans and tax-exempt special savings accounts? Is it any wonder that, since the last election, the savings ratio has plummeted to 7 per cent?

Mr. Milburn: If I were the hon. Gentleman, I would be careful about quoting savings ratios, because under his Government the savings ratio hit a low of 3 per cent. It is now 7 per cent. and rising. It is rising precisely because of the economic stability that this Government have created. I tell the hon. Gentleman and hon. Members who are chuntering from the Front Bench that the worst enemy of savers is the rampant inflation that we saw under the previous Government.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Is it not the case that pensioners with savings gain most from the current extremely low level of headline inflation? Is not that beneficial product of the Labour Government's policies a contrast with the prolonged double-figure inflation rates that we had under the previous Government?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: pensioners and others are benefiting from the low-inflation climate that we have managed to create. We have created a form of economic stability that this country has not seen for many years, with interest rates at their lowest level in more than 20 years, mortgages at their lowest rate for more than 30 years, inflation down and public finances under control. All of that is in marked contrast to the economic turmoil that we saw when the previous lot were in power.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): The savings ratio was 9.7 per cent. on average in the last three years of the Conservative Government. How does the Chancellor reconcile his fine words about increasing investment with the fact that the savings ratio has fallen by 26 per cent. since his Government came to power? It is, indeed, the attack on savings that has led to that. Not only have the subscriptions to individual savings accounts in the first quarter, in value terms, been enormously down on PEPs and TESSAs; not only are pension funds losing £5 billion a year; but the Chancellor will find, following the initiatives on stakeholder pensions, that there is a massive fall in the value of company pension scheme provisioning to money pensions, and a massive increase in people cashing in personal pensions. Here again we have the Government spinning one thing and doing another.

Mr. Milburn: I know that the hon. Gentleman and the Conservative party do not like individual savings accounts, but the truth is that savers do. In the first two months following their launch, savers invested more than £4 billion in them—more than twice as much as was invested in PEPs and TESSAs during exactly the same period last year. What is most heartening from the Government's point of view—and, I should have thought, from the point of view of the House as a whole—is that most of the savings were invested in cash ISAs, which will benefit small savers especially. The Government are creating not only economic stability, but an environment in which saving will expand and increase.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for asking his question, because, in many respects, his is the authentic voice of the Conservative party. He is the man who says that he wants state pensions to be privatised, and sickness and unemployment benefits to be transferred to the private sector. Moreover, rather than agreeing with his hon. Friends on the Back Benches that public spending should be increased, he wants it to be cut by £50 billion this year, next year and every year. That is the authentic voice of the Conservative party.

Green-field Housing Development

11. Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): What plans he has to impose a tax on green-field housing development; and if he will make a statement. [91103]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Barbara Roche): The Chancellor has no present plans to impose a tax on green-field developments. The Government keep under review the scope for using economic instruments to complement the planning system in achieving their social and environmental objectives.

Mr. Mullin: I am disappointed by that reply. As my hon. Friend will know, agricultural land that is normally worth between £3,000 and £5,000 per acre is now changing hands at up to £8,000 per acre, and much of the gross gain is being rolled over for the purposes of capital gains tax. Is this not one area in which the Treasury, without arousing any political controversy, might raise some extra money for the public?

Mrs. Roche: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I know of his long-standing interest in the matter, and I know that he has had a meeting with my hon. Friend the Paymaster General.

Roll-over relief enables businesses to modernise and expand. I assure my hon. Friend, however, that we are giving careful consideration to Lord Rogers's report, and, as my hon. Friend the Paymaster General has said, will return to the House with our conclusions.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): Earlier this morning it was the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew); now it is the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). Clearly a campaign is developing on the Labour Back Benches for the introduction of a tax on new housing development. Given the Government's track record in regard to the introduction of new taxes, does the Financial Secretary not owe it to potential home owners to rule out categorically the introduction of such a tax?

Mrs. Roche: I am astonished at the right hon. Gentleman's cheek. He was a Treasury Minister in the Government who introduced the measure that imposed VAT on fuel—the measure that hit hard-working families most. He should spend some time examining his own record—the record that got the Conservative party into such a mess.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Does my hon. Friend agree that we have a great opportunity for the next 10 years? With a taxation policy married to an environmental policy that is sensible and far-sighted, we can regenerate our towns and cities by tackling brown-field and contaminated sites. However, a flow of taxation moneys will be needed to help brown-field sites to compete with green-field sites.

If I were asked to advise the Government, I would advise them to emphasise the importance of making brown-field development a priority, rather than taxing green-field development.

Mrs. Roche: I understand completely the points that my hon. Friend makes, and—as he knows—the Government have set a target for increasing the proportion of new housing on brown-field sites. He is also absolutely right to talk about the need for a joined-up and co-ordinated approach, not only in the Treasury but in all Departments, in achieving that goal. Consequently, we are very grateful to Lord Rogers and are considering his recommendations very carefully.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the hon. Lady please tell the House what type of incentives are being considered to encourage brown-field rather than green-field site development?

Mrs. Roche: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads the Rogers report—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] The Rogers report is very detailed, dealing not only with a range of fiscal measures, but with all the other initiatives that the Government are undertaking in urban areas. It is very much a report for all Departments, and Treasury Ministers will be considering it very carefully. However, as my hon. Friend the Paymaster General said, it is a matter not only for the Treasury but for other Departments; on planning, for example, it is a matter for the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. We shall make a co-ordinated response as soon as we possibly can, after we have considered the report.

Public Sector Investment

12. Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): What is the level of extra investment he has allocated to the public sector since May 1997. [91104]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alan Milburn): The comprehensive spending review, in July 1998, allocated an additional £65 billion within total departmental expenditure limits over the next three years. Of that, some £40 billion is extra investment in health and education.

Ms Hughes: I thank my right hon. Friend for that information, which demonstrates that—unlike the previous Government, who tried to destroy public services—this Government are investing massively in the future of those services. Does he agree that, after those Tory years, across the public sector, we need not only new ways of doing things, but new ways of thinking—such as more responsive services, much higher quality and more creativity? How will the Government ensure that the extra investment provided will produce the radical transformation that we need?

Mr. Milburn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. Our public services not only have a repair, maintenance and infrastructural improvement backlog but need to be modernised so that they provide the responsive and modern services which people nowadays quite rightly expect. That is why the record levels of investment that we have made available for health, education and other public services are tied to specific outcomes—and why, in our public service agreements, we have set 600 targets that we expect to be met. The end result will be not only smaller class sizes, shorter waiting lists and less congestion, but dramatically improved public services in communities across the land which people will be experiencing in the next few years.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): In an ideal world, should the proportion of gross domestic product taken by the public sector increases or decrease?

Mr. Milburn: I know that the hon. Gentleman likes talking about ideal worlds, as that is easier than living in the real one. Nevertheless, on his question, he should have a word with his Front-Bench spokesmen—such as the shadow Chancellor, who, when we announced our record extra investment in health and education, described our spending plans as madness; or the Leader of the Opposition, who described our spending plans as reckless; or the shadow Chief Secretary, who said that they were dangerous. The Conservatives now say that they want to sign up to them—but their spending plans do not add up any more than their figures do.

VAT (Church Buildings)

13. Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): What representations he has received recently on the level of VAT on church building repairs and renovations. [91106]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Treasury Ministers have received a number of letters asking for a zero rate or reduced rate of VAT for repairs to church buildings.

Mr. Pike: Does my hon. Friend accept that, in many parts of the country, churches are an important part of our heritage, and that many of the older buildings cost considerable sums to maintain and operate? Is there not a very strong case for at least reducing VAT on such repairs—accepting that they cannot be zero-rated—to 5 per cent?

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend will know that the construction of new churches, church halls and village halls is free of VAT, and that, each year, £20 million is granted for the maintenance and repair of churches. Within current VAT legislation, the Government do not have the ability to reduce the rate.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Has the Minister looked at the problems in many inner-city areas where people are trying to renovate buildings rather than knocking them down and starting again or using green-field sites? A moment ago the Financial Secretary to the Treasury referred to joined-up government. Is there not a suggestion that, unless the issue is tackled, there constantly will be an incentive for people to knock down and start again or to go to a green-field site?

Dawn Primarolo: Yes, the Government are aware of that, and Lord Rogers has looked at such subjects in the urban task force report. It is a pity that the decline of those areas occurred not just since the last general election but under the last Government, who did absolutely nothing about it.

Business of the House

12.30 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): Would the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The business of the House for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 26 JULY—Conclusion of consideration of Lords amendments to the Employment Relations Bill.

Supplemental allocation of time motion relating to the Local Government Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Local Government Bill.

TUESDAY 27 JULY—Debate on public expenditure on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages which may be received.

The provisional business for the first week back after the summer recess will be as follows:

TUESDAY 19 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on the first report from the Treasury Committee on the Office for National Statistics, followed by a debate on the reports from the Select Committee on Public Administration on the work of the ombudsman. Both debates will arise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

WEDNESDAY 20 OCTOBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day [20th Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on a motion in the name of the Liberal Democrats. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 21 OCTOBER—Debate on the fourth report from the Procedure Committee on the procedural consequences of devolution.

FRIDAY 22 OCTOBER—The House will not be sitting.

Sir George Young: We are grateful to the Leader of the House for giving us next week's business and an indication of the business for the first week back. Having said that, today's statement is not a happy one with which to conclude before the recess. I very much regret that, at short notice last night, the Government decided to guillotine two Bills, neither of which the Opposition had planned to delay. The right hon. Lady has now announced yet another guillotine for Monday. I will set out the reasons why we feel that the Government have overreacted when we debate the motion later. At this stage, I would say that the Government have played their hand badly and sent the House off on the wrong note.

Can the right hon. Lady assure the House that Members will be able to get here for the next guillotine debate on Monday? I understand that another group of citizens whom the Government have driven to despair are to lobby Parliament—this time, the truckers, following the latest meeting of the road haulage forum on Monday, which demonstrated that the Government are interested only in delay and not in genuine discussion.

I welcome the proposed debate on the Procedure Committee's report on the consequences of devolution, for which I—and you, Madam Speaker—have been calling. We will do our best to help the Government find the right way through the consequences of devolution for this House which, clearly, they have not thought through.

Also in the first week back, we are due to discuss the Office for National Statistics. Should not we use the time to debate the royal commission on long-term care—a debate that has been called for repeatedly in the six months since publication of the report and which the Government seem anxious to avoid?

Finally, I understand that the Government will publish their annual report next week. Does the right hon. Lady agree that the place to hold the Government to account is not before the press and civil servants in the rose garden at No. 10—as last year—but here, before Members of Parliament, in the Chamber of the House of Commons?

Mrs. Beckett: I, too, regret the fact that the Government have found it necessary to introduce timetable motions on the debates of which I have given notice today. Conservative Members seem to have got it into their heads that things run all one way in the House and that they are at liberty to play the rules as they choose, without the Government being able to have similar regard to those rules. We will be able to touch on those matters if Conservative Members want to debate them. We, too, regret the fact that it was not possible to reach agreement on the handling of legislation. We have to protect not only Government business but the interests of the House as a whole.

On groups being driven to despair, I am not sure what those who were lobbying the House yesterday were driven to, but they were certainly making the most extraordinary noises, which I presume were supposed to be evocative of some part of their argument; they were certainly interesting, if not illuminating.

I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman welcomes the debate on procedure, for which, as he rightly said, both he and Madam Speaker have asked us to find time. I reject the notion that there is something unforeseen about the debate. We need to consider how our procedures can evolve and we will have a useful opportunity to discuss that.

I think that we have been waiting—as the right hon. Gentleman would put it—for the debate on long-term care for closer to four months than six. We will of course have that debate, but we will not be able to have it as early as he suggests.

I listened with great interest to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks on the annual report. I am slightly surprised if he is saying that it should be announced in a statement to the House, as I rather had the impression that he thought otherwise in the past, but I will certainly bear his remarks in mind in the future.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will my right hon. Friend find time in the not-too-distant future for a further debate in a calm atmosphere on the recommendations of the Modernisation Committee on pre-legislative scrutiny? I chaired the Special Select Committee on the Food Standards Bill, which took evidence from two Ministers on two occasions and from 24 organisations and three other individuals. We spent many hours producing a report most of whose recommendations the Government accepted. In view of this week's events, especially as there were more than 20 Opposition amendments on

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

Report, following both Second Reading and the Standing Committee, we need to decide whether this is how the Modernisation Committee wanted us to proceed or whether legislation should go through Parliament in a calmer and more sensible way.

Mrs. Beckett: I had thought that the whole House was grateful to my hon. Friend and the Committee for the excellent work that they did on the Food Standards Bill. Until yesterday, those proceedings were thought to have been a model of the way in which we would all want the all-party recommendations of the Modernisation Committee to be implemented. The Special Select Committee did excellent work, as Select Committees always do, and my hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the hope was that the legislation would be handled all the better, and would be better legislation, because of the degree and the kind of scrutiny that it had received. I was especially sorry to hear Conservative Members criticising the work of the Special Select Committee.

I agree that if we are to proceed with proper modernisation, we must bear in mind that it will never happen if, at the last minute, when all the proper procedures for a modernised debate have been carried through, people want to take the opportunity to exploit the use of time and not to debate a Bill properly. The House will have to take that into account.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I urge the Leader of the House to find time for the Government to explain to the House why they have made a material change to the contracts for special advisers. Is she aware that, under the previous Administration, special advisers were specifically warned not to engage in purely party political activities, whereas under the new Labour contract they are specifically encouraged to brief Labour Back Benchers?

Will the Leader of the House find time for the Government to explain why the House has been told that there has been no change in the arrangements, when that is clearly not the case? Why have we been told that no records are kept of briefings given by special advisers, when I have in my hand an example of a Department for Education and Employment briefing that is titled, dated and numbered, gives specific references to other titled, dated and numbered briefings and states where copies of such briefings can be obtained? Can the Leader of the House explain why the House has been told that no records are kept?

Finally, on the first question raised by the shadow Leader of the House, will the right hon. Lady provide time to reflect on the use of guillotine motions? Does she accept that the orderly programming of business by timetable motions agreed by all parties is for the benefit of the House, but that the procedure is being brought into disrepute by the sudden introduction of guillotines of which the Opposition parties have had no notice?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman asked me a number of questions about political advisers. I do not know why the House has been told that no records are kept. Perhaps it is because they are not—[HON. MEMBERS: "Perhaps?"] Well, I do not know. The hon. Gentleman makes several suggestions about changes that he says have taken place in the way in which special advisers are employed under this Government compared with under the previous Government. I am not familiar with the arrangements under which special advisers were employed by the previous Government. On at least one occasion, statements were made purporting to suggest changes in the way in which special advisers are able to operate, which—I am told—were not well founded. Conservative Members suggested, for example, that there were changes in the rules that had operated when they were in government when that was not the case. As for the hon. Gentleman's basic assertion that under the previous Government special advisers held themselves aloof from the impurity of party politics, I can only say that the large number of former special advisers decorating the Opposition Benches suggests that that policy was spectacularly unsuccessful.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point about the orderly progress of business and timetable motions. I entirely share his view. I am not sure whether he was able to be in the House last night. If he was, he will know both that I regretted that we felt we had to introduce these timetable motions and that I made it plain that an agreed timetable was sought and it was only when agreement was not forthcoming that we felt we had to take action to protect not only today's but tomorrow's business.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I for one do not question in any way the right of the Opposition to delay business? That is the legitimate right of the Opposition. Is it not the case that during the 18 years that we were in opposition, when we delayed business, the Government's response was always to introduce a guillotine motion? Therefore, there is absolutely no difference in the responses of the previous and the present Governments. Is my right hon. Friend further aware that on Monday night, when we stayed until two o'clock in the morning—I make no complaints whatever—some Opposition Members voted against every order on the agenda, including one that would have extended the opening hours for the millennium celebrations? They are spoilsports and we should tell the country so.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. I am particularly grateful to him for drawing attention to the fact that the Conservative party voted against the licensing extension for the millennium celebrations. Their constituents should all be made aware that the Conservative party wishes them to stay at home without the opportunity of alcoholic refreshment—the new killjoy approach to politics.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): In the light of the last remark of the Leader of the House, may I say that I voted against the motion because my constituents do not wish the licensing laws to be extended through the night and Westminster city council contributed to the consultation paper exactly on those lines?

Mrs. Beckett: I am even more grateful to the right hon. Gentleman—if that is possible—because I was under the misapprehension that many Conservative Members voted to make a gesture without being fully aware that, as he has made plain, it was a deliberate decision.

That reinforces the argument that it is only right for their constituents to know that they have made that decision, as they are perfectly entitled to do.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that four regions of the United Kingdom have benefited from billions of pounds of aid from Europe under objective 1 status. Is she aware that the deadline for the initial submission is the end of October, just after we return? To meet the deadline, those four regions need to have indications of support from a series of Government Departments. May we have a statement before the House adjourns on the financial support that will be available for objective 1 applications?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot undertake to my right hon. Friend that we will be able to find time for such a statement. However, I understand the point that he makes and I will certainly draw his remarks to the attention of the relevant Departments and my right hon. and hon. Friends there.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Will the right hon. Lady reflect that I cannot remember when guillotine motions were introduced in the last week of a Parliament, when we could sit on a few extra days to have all the debate that we might want? It really seems a little strange that that is the line that the Government are taking. During next week and the recess, will she consider whether the Government can produce an answer to the important suggestion that has been made by members of the Modernisation Committee that hon. Members might be able to table written questions when the House is not sitting? As we are not sitting for 12 weeks, many hon. Members reasonably feel that they would like to get answers out of Ministers during that time. The answers could be published in Hansard on a weekly basis. That would enhance the way in which Back-Bench Members on both sides of the House could keep the Government up to scratch.

Mrs. Beckett: I take on board the strong and powerful request that the right hon. Gentleman makes for the House to sit for longer and not to adjourn next Tuesday. It is not entirely clear to me whether he carries the majority of his party with him in making that request. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] Oh, he does. Well, that is interesting, especially in view of the number of occasions on which Opposition Members have pressed me, over such a sustained period, to give the dates of the recess.

I recognise that one characteristic of opposition is that the memory fails a little. I am aware, but the right hon. Gentleman has perhaps overlooked the fact, that the recess dates that I have proposed are shorter than those for four out of the five years of the previous Parliament. Far from proposing a longer recess, as some Opposition Members allege that the Government have done, we are already proposing a shorter one. However, I take the right hon. Gentleman's point about written questions. It is a matter that the Government are considering. He will know that there are implications for the staff of the House as well as for others. The matter is under discussion and I accept that it is a worthwhile point to consider.

Mr. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North): Can time be found for a debate on yesterday's Court of Appeal decision on my constituent, Mrs. Carol Glass. To be of help, Madam Speaker, the lady in question has a son of 12 who is disabled. Doctors decided to hasten his death by the injection of diamorphine. The parents objected severely and wanted a court decision. It was refused. The Court of Appeal decision yesterday was not clear and it needs redefining. Only the House could discuss the issue in its own way, to define the matter for the future.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have, of course, as the whole House will have, great sympathy for families and, indeed, clinicians who find themselves in those difficult circumstances. However, with great respect, although the House is a forum in which such matters may be aired, I am wary of seeking to decide such issues within this forum. It is difficult enough for the courts, clinicians and families to make such decisions. I fear that, much though I sympathise with the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised, I cannot undertake to find time for such a debate in the near future.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Bearing in mind the new-found fondness of the Leader of the House for finding time on Fridays for private Members' Bills, will she give us an assurance that, before the House considers such Bills in the next Session, she will have found time for consideration of the fifth report of the Procedure Committee? The report notes that, when ministerial statements are made on Fridays on private Members' Bill days, the House should be given extra time to discuss those Bills, so that the time for ministerial statements is not taken out of private Members' time. That might have ensured that my Bus Fuel Duty (Exemptions) Bill, which would have given a rebate to community transport, would have passed through the House instead of being talked out by a Minister. I find the right hon. Lady's new fondness for private Members' Bills somewhat insincere.

Mrs. Beckett: I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman on his desire to assist community transport. It is perhaps unfortunate that he did not manage to do so when he was a Minister at the then Department of Transport, and has been forced to rely on the private Members' Bill mechanism— but there we go; I realise that we all have difficulties from time to time. However, we are giving proper and thorough consideration to the fifth report of the Procedure Committee.

Angela Smith (Basildon): The Leader of the House will be aware of the announcement earlier this week of new improvements to the vaccine for meningitis C. As secretary of the all-party Cuba group, I have been observing progress on the disease for some time, because the Cuban Government have largely eradicated meningitis C; I hope that we can do the same. May we have a debate on the achievements in the NHS? I realise that there has been an Opposition debate on the NHS, but it seemed to be critical of and did not do justice to the staff in the NHS—nurses, doctors, clinicians and support staff. Would it not now be opportune to hold a debate on the achievements of the NHS and its staff?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I share her view that there is much to celebrate in the achievements of the health service; it is a pity that sometimes the focus of debate in this place is on problems rather than on successes. Although I accept the strength of my hon. Friend's case—I am aware of the work that she and her group have carried out in studying the issue—I regret that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate in the near future.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House confirm that, during the next few days, the Government will make an announcement on those regions in the United Kingdom that may be eligible for objective 2 status under European Union structural funds? Does she acknowledge that such an announcement is vital for many regions represented by Members on both sides of the House? Does she accept that the way in which the decision on regional selective aid was made—at a press conference—did not allow Members the opportunity to cross-examine Ministers on the announcement? Does she also accept that, as there are only a few days left before the summer recess, it is imperative that she finds time, at the appropriate moment, for a statement by Ministers on that matter, so that Members can cross-examine them on the result of the announcement?

Mrs. Beckett: Consideration is being given to how we can inform hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that great effort was made by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to give Members of Parliament as much information as possible. I understand that consideration is being given to how that can be followed up and the fullest possible information can be made available.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble): My right hon. Friend will be aware that, since the general election, there has been no debate on the aerospace industry in general, although there have been debates in the context of defence procurement. Given that major changes are due in the European aerospace industry over the next few years, will she be able to find time, after the recess, for a debate on the future of the UK aerospace industry?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that my hon. Friend takes a great interest in these matters; I believe that he is the new chair of the all-party aerospace group—on which I heartily congratulate him. I fear, however, that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate on the aerospace industry in the very near future, although I am aware of the enormous importance of that industry throughout the UK—not least in the north-west—and of its international success. I fear that that success will have to go somewhat unsung—at least for a little while. However, we shall soon be at the stage of considering which issues will be discussed in the Queen's Speech. My hon. Friend may find an opportunity to raise the matter in those debates.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): When can we have a debate about the massive expenditure of public funds through the common agricultural policy? Is not the need for such a debate all the more urgent in light of the appalling information that I received in a written answer from Ministers last week, which revealed that last year the European Community spent £100 million on destroying a vast amount of food, including 174,000 tonnes of cauliflowers and 240,000 tonnes of tomatoes? As we are spending £100 million on destroying food, is it not time that the House of Commons debated that subject?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman will know that I have long shared his view that the common agricultural policy needs significant reform. That view is being shared more widely across Europe and the world. The hon. Gentleman will know also that some reforms have been undertaken—although not as many as we would like. We are all seeking opportunities to continue to pursue the issue of CAP reform, not least through international discussions that may take place in the next year or so.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): Can my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the work of the electoral commission and revitalising democracy? I visited Eddisbury yesterday where voters were clearly motivated by the chance to meet by-election candidates and the Prime Minister but were turned off by the yobbish behaviour of the Conservative party. We need new, radical proposals to revitalise interest, particularly among young people, in the democratic process.

Mrs. Beckett: I share my hon. Friend's view about that important issue. I know that some people continue to believe that we should make it difficult for people to register their vote, but I think that we should make it easier. My hon. Friend will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary presented a full list of proposals on that matter last week. I am aware that the voters of Eddisbury have the opportunity to express their views today, and I am sure that all Labour Members—but perhaps not Opposition Members—hope that, when they do so, they will bear in mind the Government's many achievements, such as the lowest mortgage rates for 30 years, low inflation, a successful and stable economy and no more boom and bust.

I am strongly of the view that, in elections of any sort, we should pay some attention to the deficiencies of our system. I fear that I cannot undertake to find time to debate that subject in the near future, but I will bear in mind my hon. Friend's remarks.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The Leader of the House will be aware that we have been pressing for some time for a general debate on Northern Ireland. She will be aware also that the IRA issued a strange statement this morning. May we have a debate in the spill-over period so that we may reflect upon the issues coolly and calmly? Senator Mitchell was invited to travel this road four years ago, but he missed that part of the journey. The decommissioning body then missed its opportunity. Political discussions then led to the Belfast agreement and the decommissioning body was tasked with producing a report. However, the reality is that we have had no decommissioning. What message are three democratic Governments—this Government, the Republic of Ireland Government and the United States Government—sending to terrorists throughout the world when we pander to that sort of behaviour?

Mrs. Beckett: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, all those Governments are continuing to send the consistent message that we believe in the Good Friday agreement, that we want to see it carried through and that we want the peace process to reach a successful conclusion. I cannot undertake to find time so far in advance for the debate that the hon. Gentleman seeks in the spill-over period. However, I obviously do not rule it out. As we get nearer to the time, it may prove to be the correct thing to do. I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request, but I am sure he understands that I cannot give him a date at present.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the war being waged by South Birmingham community health council to prevent the building of a new hospital in south Birmingham? It appears that 14 individuals are prepared to use the health council as a cover for their campaign which is based on information that they know to be false. How is that an acceptable use of public funds? Will my right hon. Friend try to find time in future for a debate on the funding and accountability of community health councils?

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that I was not aware of the problem to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention. I can well understand his concern if he thinks that difficulties are being caused for the provision of health care to his constituents. I cannot undertake to find time in the near future for a debate on the specific subject that he raises, but I undertake to draw his concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Does the right hon. Lady not now regret building in the extra, unnecessary week's holiday in February so that Labour Back Benchers can have a few more days off? Will she now reverse the distressing trend of the new Labour Government to give longer and longer recesses so that less and less time is spent in the House and then ruthlessly to curtail debate on every item of substance? [Interruption.] There would be plenty of time to debate matters in the House if the right hon. Lady followed the conventions and traditions of parliamentary debate, rather than guillotining debates.

Mrs. Beckett: I could not quite hear all the right hon. Gentleman's final remarks because of the noise that his colleagues were making. I simply say to him that he is living in a fantasy world. He clearly did not take the trouble to conduct even the most cursory scrutiny—which would be in sound parliamentary tradition—of the facts before he made his points. It is totally untrue to say that the Government have given longer recesses than previous Governments, as I have already pointed out to the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery). This recess is shorter than was the norm under the Government whom the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) served so comparatively recently.

As for the mid-February break, I do not regret that, because, Madam Speaker, you will recall, as the right hon. Gentleman clearly does not, that the all-party Modernisation Committee recommended that break because it believed that it would be conducive to the smoother and more effective working of Parliament. Only a few Conservative Members objected, at least publicly, when I sought to accommodate the expressed wish of the House, which is also consistent with parliamentary tradition.

The right hon. Gentleman needs to get it into his head that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said earlier, it is of course right, proper and consistent with the traditions of the House for the Opposition to seek to exploit the opportunities available to them regarding the use of time. It is also well within the traditions of the House for the Government to have to deal with those attempts from time to time.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is about time that we revisited the Modernisation Committee's work on electronic voting? In particular, is it not a great waste of time that we go though the Lobby to vote on motions that have not even been debated in the House? At the very least, could we consider the opportunity to use electronic voting on such motions?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point that, as he will know, is raised from time to time in the context of modernising the House. I fear that I cannot find time for a debate on that in the near future. Everyone understands that there is flexibility within the rules of the House for hon. Members, as individuals or as organised groups, to make their case by causing disruption to the proceedings from time to time. That is well within our parliamentary traditions, but hon. Members must realise that if feeling begins to grow in the House that those traditions are being frivolously misused, that will cause problems.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): Will the Leader of the House find time before the end of the Session for a debate on England? We have spent a considerable time debating Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales, and there has been major constitutional change. It would be useful if hon. Members could express their views on the English question, what should happen and what should be the relationship between English Members of Parliament and other Members of the House. There is no English Question Time or any other opportunity for us to raise those issues, so a debate on England over two or three days would be more than welcome.

Mrs. Beckett: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. He regularly attends business questions, so he will have heard you, Madam Speaker, draw attention a couple of weeks ago to the fact that this is the United Kingdom Parliament and we are elected as United Kingdom MPs. There is wariness about arguments and steps that seem to jeopardise that union.

The hon. Gentleman will also have heard me make the point before that the Government have been minded to use the Standing Order, which is within the control of the House, on the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, so that a further forum for the exploration of some exclusively regional affairs could be established. That proposal has hitherto been blocked by the hon. Gentleman's party, so I say to him with great respect that although I do not question his sincerity in raising the matter, I question the sincerity of the Conservative party in saying that there is a lack of time for such a debate.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the need for more rigorous controls at our airports of passports sold for £30,000 apiece by the sleazemaster general of the Tory party, Mr. Michael Ashcroft, and about the great concern that they are now in the hands of some very dubious gentlemen who are not welcome in this country, even if they do bring money to the new sleaze fund of the Tory party?

[Mr. Denis MacShane]

Mrs. Beckett: I am not entirely sure whether the handling of passports of a foreign country falls within our remit. I know that my hon. Friend will have made his points to the relevant Secretaries of State who deal with immigration matters.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): May we have a debate on the so-called review of matters relating to Northern Ireland? It really is time, is it not—I hope that the Leader of the House will agree—to cut through the smoke and mirrors of the review, particularly in light of the fact that we now know that the IRA never had any intention of giving up any weapons? [Interruption.] It has now said so; that is now clear. Please, therefore, may we have no more pretence, and certainly no more releases of terrorists and murderers, so long as the IRA has made it clear, as it now has, that it has no intention—and has never had any intention—of giving up any of its weapons?

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman down that road. He knows that Senator Mitchell has only today begun discussions on his work. As I told the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), the Government remain committed to the Good Friday agreement. I was under the impression that it was also the policy of the Conservative party to be committed to the Good Friday agreement, although, as I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is well aware, the request that he has just made would be in danger of jeopardising that agreement. Judging by the noises that were made in support of what he said, I am wondering whether the Conservative party does any longer support the Good Friday agreement. I hope that that is a mistaken impression.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Will the right hon. Lady tell me whether she expects a statement from the Government about their response to the consultation paper on leasehold reform before we rise for the recess? If not, will she assure us that we shall get a debate on the subject in the spill-over period? However, if that is not possible, do we assume that there will be no legislative progress in this Parliament on the reform of leaseholds?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot promise the hon. Lady a debate on the matter before the Session ends. I shall draw her remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing. As to assumptions about whether anything will be done in this Parliament, the hon. Lady will know that it is never wise to make assumptions about future legislative programmes.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): In the context of the ensuing statement on consumer protection, might time be found to discuss the scam, which has been revealed by some excellent investigative journalism by the Aberdeen Press and Journal, that a Liverpool-based business man, Mr. Peter Quinn, is offering for sale bogus degree certificates for the university of Aberdeen, the Robert Gordon university and the university of Stirling? That will be a matter of concern not only to those hon. Members who, like me, are graduates or honorary graduates of those universities, but, as it obviously involves criminal fraud, it will be of concern to the House, which I am sure will wish the police, trading standards officers and the courts to deal with the matter as swiftly as possible.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am sure that the whole House shares with the concern that he has expressed, and will welcome the moves that the Government are making to strengthen consumer protection in that and other respects.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): I would be grateful if the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge) would give me the relevant address.

Will the Leader of the House see what she can do to provide time in what I know is a packed programme—perhaps this could be arranged for the spill-over period—for the House to have a debate solely on the Territorial Army, so that in the light of events in Kosovo and elsewhere and of the enormous demands for engineers and signallers, many of whom come from the TA, we can question how it was possible for the Prime Minister to say in the House yesterday that the cuts made in the TA by the Labour Government were good for the TA and further for the United Kingdom?

Mrs. Beckett: I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for a specific debate on the TA. I have no doubt that from time to time there will be opportunities to discuss defence matters. The hon. Gentleman will know that the first phase of the structural reform of the TA is now complete.

The remarks of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday stem from the view that is widely held, not least within the armed forces, that the TA as reformed will be a more relevant, more useful and more integrated part of our defence capability. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman will not be converted to that view; I fear that I cannot offer him an early opportunity again to air his view.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): May I ask the Leader of the House to reconsider her answer of a few moments ago to the request for a debate on the English question? She referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. When will the Government recognise that England is not merely a collection of regions but a nation? If the Labour party will not speak for England as a nation, others will.

Mrs. Beckett: I think, not for the first time, that the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that although the Conservative party may feel that it should speak for England, it is the Labour party that speaks for England. The Labour party has a majority of Members in England. Of course, the Conservative party has no Members in Scotland and Wales.

I will not reconsider my earlier reply. I think that the integrity of the United Kingdom is enormously important and the Government are determined to protect it. The Conservative party is playing a dangerous game in raising such fire. I think also that it must be a matter of some concern to its Scottish and Welsh parties. What will Conservative candidates in Scotland and Wales say in the next general election? Will they say, "Vote for me although my party has rejected me and does not want me to play a part in Westminster"?

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will the right hon. Lady give further thought to the reply that she gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery), who asked for the opportunity during the recess to table written questions so that the Government could be held to account during that period? The right hon. Lady, in what I hope is not her penultimate appearance as Leader of the House, did not give a terribly satisfactory reply. It would be a lasting memorial to her years as Leader of the House if she were able to give us an assurance that the Government will be held to account during the recess.

Will the right hon. Lady deprecate the way in which certain Members have abused parliamentary privilege? Does she agree with me that accusations about individuals who cannot answer in the House should not be lightly made, and should be made only if there is real substance in the allegations? When we return from the recess, will she arrange for an early debate on the report of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege that touches on those and other important matters?

Mrs. Beckett: I said to the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) that I thought that he had made an interesting point and that it was one to which I was prepared to give consideration, although it raises questions for the House authorities as well as for others. I would say to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) that the tabling of written questions during a recess would be unprecedented. It is not a practice that the Government are withholding because it is something that no previous Government have been prepared to do or to concede; I am prepared to give the matter consideration but I am not able or prepared simply to say today, "Yes, this is a change that the Government will make." As for a lasting memorial, I am not in a memorial-erecting mood today. I appreciate the thought and I will bear it in mind.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the abuse of parliamentary privilege. He is right to say that matters should not be raised lightly under the cloak of privilege. However, the purpose of privilege is to allow matters to be raised. If privilege were being abused, that would be a matter for the Chair and not only for Members. I feel confident that Madam Speaker would draw us to order were that to be required. The hon. Gentleman has asked for a debate about that and I acknowledge that we will be seeking to find time for it. I cannot tell him now exactly when it will take place.

Consumer White Paper

1.15 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Stephen Byers): Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the White Paper published today to promote the interests of consumers. The White Paper forms a key part of our programme to support competition, innovation and enterprise.

Far too many people feel that they live in rip-off Britain, where they pay high prices compared to other countries, where cheats are allowed to prosper and move from one scam to another with ease, and where there are more shoddy goods than high-quality products.

For too long, the attitude in Britain has been that things could be worse, rather than that things should be better. We do not want to create an army of Victor Meldrews, but we do need confident and informed consumers. That is why the Government are publishing a comprehensive consumer strategy today.

Consumers who are knowledgeable and demanding get a good deal. They also promote innovation and improve the competitive position of business, which in turn means better products and keener prices for consumers. The White Paper will create a virtuous circle between knowledgeable consumers and business performance. It will do that in four ways.

First, the Government will work with business and consumer groups to introduce codes of practice that actually mean something, instead of giving false reassurance to consumers. Codes already pepper the Yellow Pages, but many are little more than marketing devices, offering no safeguards to customers.

The White Paper therefore proposes to introduce legislation to give the Office of Fair Trading powers to approve codes of practice that guarantee high standards of customer service, including proper redress if things should go wrong. That approval will not be a one-off. The Office of Fair Trading will withdraw its approval if the code no longer meets these principles. The OFT's seal of approval will provide at-a-glance assurance for the consumer.

We will also develop an e-commerce code, with industry and consumer groups, to be monitored by an independent body. As purchasing over the internet expands, it is vital that people feel that they have security when they make purchases. That is why we will introduce an e-hallmark, which will provide safeguards for the purchaser.

Secondly, we want to strengthen the role of those who protect the public against those who continually cheat consumers. The current law is ineffective. It offers no deterrent to the determined cheat, the perpetual scam merchant, and the exploiter of the weak and vulnerable, and no deterrent against the one-day sale in a hotel that is simply a rip-off, or the car repairer who fails to deliver and threatens those who complain. As constituency Members of Parliament, we all know of many other examples that have been drawn to our attention.

The traders often disappear before action can be taken, then reappear elsewhere to conduct themselves in exactly the same way. The White Paper therefore proposes stronger action against such fraudsters. I want the OFT and trading standards officers in local authorities to have powers to seek injunctions to stop traders carrying out specified practices, and to give the courts the power to ban them from all trading. Cheats who continually rip off their customers should be treated in this tough and responsible way.

We will consider the imposition of criminal sanctions where appropriate. We must also be able to respond quickly to new scams that might develop. We therefore propose a power to make orders by secondary legislation, which will specify that certain practices that have been shown to be harmful should be made illegal.

The third key proposal in the White Paper is better access to advice. People need quick, accurate answers to consumer problems. We will promote the development of a new advice network, building on the existing agencies. People will be able to see easily where they can get good-quality advice. We will also set up a new telephone helpline. Today, I have launched a new consumer gateway on the internet, to provide easy access to consumer advice and information.

Fourthly, we will improve research on consumer issues, so that our policies are based on sound evidence. Many feel that they are paying higher prices for everyday items than people in other countries. We can all understand why rice costs less in China than in Chingford, but why do trainers cost less in New York than in Newcastle, or a CD less in Washington than in Winsford?

I have, therefore, launched a full survey of international price comparisons. That will compare the prices of some 100 products across four countries—the United Kingdom, France, Germany and the United States. I already have powers to refer prices in a particular sector to the Director General of Fair Trading, and I will use those if the survey shows that the British consumer is being overcharged.

The White Paper contains some 70 measures, which cover a whole range of issues. We will make prices clearer to customers; consult on plans for tougher controls on misdescription of services; make sure that a pint of beer is a pint of beer; and make it easier for people to spot if the mileage reading on a car has been fiddled. We will also support and improve enforcement agencies so that they are better able to meet the expectations of consumers and business.

We do not want to distract business from its focus on serving its customers. We will in addition, therefore, begin a programme of reviewing all consumer protection legislation to find out whether it is still effective in meeting the needs of consumers, or whether it has simply become a burden on business with no apparent benefit to the consumer. To start the review, I have today published a consultation document on the law covering weights and measures.

The programme in the White Paper is ambitious. It reinforces our commitment to modern, open markets. It works with the grain of the knowledge economy. It promotes stronger business performance as well as a better deal for consumers. It rejects endless regulation as the saviour of the consumer in favour of competition, information and effective sanctions against rogue traders. It is forward looking and sets a framework for the future. It charts a new way forward in which consumers and business serve each other's interests—benefiting us all through quality products and improved services.

A fair deal for all our people—that is the vision of this White Paper, and I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I thank the Secretary of State for making the documentation available to me just over an hour ago; I am most grateful.

There is much that we can welcome in the White Paper because it gives the consumer a fair deal. In particular, we welcome the fact that research into identifying retail price differentials between the United States, Germany, France and the United Kingdom will be improved. It is important that we identify exactly how the pricing structure is achieved before there is any hasty action to name and shame. For example, the strength of the pound, employment costs, land prices and so on will have a different impact in different countries. Therefore we welcome the Government's initiative in that area.

The Secretary of State mentioned enforcement and, in particular, the Office of Fair Trading and trading standards officers, but he did not mention resources. Given existing legislation, never mind any additions that he may intend to make, it is clear that resources, particularly in trading standards departments, are extremely important. It would be helpful if he would say how much new money will be put into backing the White Paper, particularly for trading standards officers.

To give just one example, since the Government took office, trading standards officers have been charged with the task of identifying the GM content of processed foods. The technology developed in the past few years to carry out such tests is still extremely expensive and trading standards officers do not have the resources to carry out that task. We are looking to the Government to endorse the proposals in the White Paper with detail on how they intend to resource the promises.

The Secretary of State's decision to review all consumer legislation is welcome, as long as no additional burden is placed on business. It is not acceptable simply to consider the legislation with a view to adding to the unnecessary burdens on businesses. He says that he does not want us to be a nation of Victor Meldrews; I say to him, "I don't believe it!" because the hallmark of the Government is their introduction of ill-thought-through legislation and their subsequent reliance on endless regulations, which are a burden and a brake on enterprise and on business.

Consumers have more spending power today than ever before, and we support any initiatives to give them best value and to ensure that they are well informed, but may I ask the Secretary of State about a particular part of his statement? He said that the Government have been able to respond quickly to new scams, which is good, and that they therefore propose to introduce a power to make orders by secondary legislation, specifying that certain practices that have been shown to be harmful should be made illegal. Will his suggestion lead to the creation of a criminal offence? If so, is secondary legislation the appropriate means for dealing with such an offence? I should be grateful if he identified in more detail what he means by practices that have been shown to be harmful and exactly how the law will follow his suggestion through to ensure that such practices do not occur.

The Secretary of State also mentioned the important matter of electronic commerce, which is a growing area for consumers and something that we welcome. It will create a lot of changes. He is, of course, aware that there is a global marketplace; people are already buying across national borders. He mentioned an e-hallmark to cover goods sold through electronic commerce. How will that work? Will it apply to goods sold from a base in the United Kingdom? Is he seeking EU standards? How will the e-hallmark work in respect of people who make electronic purchases beyond the shores of the United Kingdom, particularly from the EU and further afield? We should be grateful for more detail on that.

Bearing in mind that this point has been flagged up in the press, so one must assume that it is true, can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he intends to release the draft e-commerce Bill in the next 24 hours? Can he also confirm that no statutory licensing provisions will appear in it? We welcome his reference to weights and measures, but the Government failed to push in Europe for an additional moratorium for market traders. They are concerned because the regulations will change at the turn of the year, and traders in loose goods will be required to label goods in metric and imperial weights. Why did not the Government press for the derogation to be extended for another 10 years? This matter will cause those traders and their consumers a great deal of concern.

I must pick the Secretary of State up on one point. At the beginning of his statement, he said that there are more shoddy goods than high-quality products. We want the scams to end, and we want people who produce defective goods and services to be brought to book so that consumers are protected from them, but I caution him: that sort of language talks down the majority of traders and the bulk of the goods in this country. He needs to strike a balance. I shall leave him with a quote from John Ruskin, who died in 1900—the turn of the century. He said:

"It is not cheaper things we want to possess but expensive things that cost less."

Most consumers would agree with that; it is nothing new. If the White Paper can achieve that, it will have the support of Conservative Members.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful for the support that has been offered by the Opposition to many points in the White Paper. I hope that it is one of those sectors where, in a spirit of partnership, the House can go with the grain of what we seek to achieve. We will wish to pursue the issue in that way.

The hon. Lady raised a number of questions. On retail prices, clearly, a range of issues needs to be taken into account in addressing why products cost more in one country than in another. It is dangerous to look at the matter in a superficial, headline way. We need to get below the figures and to find out exactly what makes them up; I am very keen that we should do so. We should expose all the arguments, even if some may be more difficult to address than others.

With regard to legislation and burdens on business, I hope that, when the hon. Lady has had the chance to look at our document on weights and measures, she will get a clear feel for the direction in which we want to go, which is very much about reviewing the current position.

Most businesses are concerned about the mass of detailed regulations that come from the weights and measures legislation. We are considering ways in which to withdraw some of them to make life much easier for business. That will not compromise the position of consumers, who will still have protection, but it will make life much easier for businesses.

On e-commerce and buying through the internet, in international transactions, there is a real issue about where the contract is actually made and about which legislation would apply if there were a dispute after a contract was not complied with. In the White Paper, we say that we will seek agreement with the company or organisation that is selling through the internet. If it agrees to meet certain standards in complying with our consumer law on guarantees of quality of product, delivery and so on, we will give it our e-hallmark. If businesses do not agree to that, they will not receive the hallmark. That will be a simple way in which consumers can see whether the person with whom they are dealing, whether based in the UK, continental Europe, America or elsewhere, is meeting those standards. It is also an effective way in which businesses can comply with the standards. The pay-off for them is that, on their website, they will be able to demonstrate the e-hallmark to show the consumer that they have guaranteed those standards.

We hope to publish the e-commerce Bill in draft tomorrow. The hon. Lady needs to wait until then to see the detail, although she may have a good idea of what might be included in it.

We need to be able to move quickly on new scams. It is a dramatically fast-moving area: new scams are developing almost daily. We may find that, if we try to put something in stone today, we shall be out of touch by tomorrow, so we need some flexibility, although I take the point that criminal sanctions are a significant step. I said in the statement that we were considering criminal sanctions in certain sectors. We will consult fully before we embark on that road.

The hon. Lady makes an important point on enforcement. If we are to ensure that, day to day, enforcement is effective, we will need to provide trading standard officers with the means to deliver on the ground. Because of the priority that we attach to the White Paper and to consumers, whom we now want to bring centre stage, I will devote from my Department—redirecting resources that are earmarked within the budget to go elsewhere—an extra £30 million to deliver on the White Paper proposals.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I now call Mr. Dennis Turner.

Hon. Members: He has just walked in.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): I was sitting here when I listened to the excellent statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I should like to say without any further interruption how much I appreciate the White Paper, particularly the reference to giving the millions of beer drinkers in this country the protection and consumer support that they deserve. In the previous Session, I tried to introduce the Weights and Measures (Beer and Cider) Bill which sought to do just that. I look at the expressions of Conservative Members. The Conservative party had the opportunity to support earlier legislation in the interests of beer drinkers, but it refused to do so. In 1992, it took similar legislation out of the programme and refused to give that protection—what a contrast with the Labour Government and the Secretary of State, to whom I am extremely grateful. The beer drinkers of Britain will also be extremely grateful. I hope that, as a consequence of the White Paper, before too long we shall see this long-overdue legislation and that every beer drinker in Britain will get the fair measures that they deserve.

Mr. Byers: I look forward to raising a full measure with my hon. Friend later today to celebrate the full measure contained within the White Paper. I am sure that the White Paper will be welcomed by beer drinkers throughout the country and by millions of other people. I compliment my hon. Friend on raising this matter over a number of years to try to get a fair deal for the British beer drinker. I am delighted that we have been able to find space in the White Paper to take up his best proposals. This is a good example of a Government working for everyone, including beer drinkers, unlike the Conservative Government who worked just for the few.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I, too, thank the Secretary of State for providing me with his statement an hour before he delivered it. Incidentally, it puts excellent flesh on the bones of the summary provided by BBC Online from about 9 o'clock this morning.

I welcome the first proposal and should like to raise a few points on the key principles for consumers: access, choice, information and redress. On codes of practice, it is important that trade associations achieve a change of emphasis from self-interest to consumer interests. Will the Secretary of State confirm that he intends self-regulation to be a universal concept, applied wherever possible, across all sectors of commerce and trading? Codes of practice are one thing, but compliance with them is another. Will he confirm that non-compliance with the code of practice would be an automatic cause for redress by consumers, with prosecution to follow where appropriate? Will he confirm that the breaking of the code of conduct will trigger the process?

Like the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), I welcome the strengthening of trading standards officers' powers. The Secretary of State mentioned the £30 million in his coffers. He knows that trading standards officers are incredibly overstretched. What discussions has he had with his colleagues in the Cabinet to ensure that more resources are available to strengthen trading standards departments in local authorities, which are at the sharp end?

I welcome the promotion of the advice network for consumers set out in the statement. How will that link in with the CBA network—[HON. MEMBERS: "CAB".] Yes, I beg hon. Members' pardon. Citizens advice bureaux are often the first port of call when consumers seek redress if they have a problem with goods or products. [Interruption.] Although I enjoy the humour of Conservative Back-Bench Members, this is an important issue. What consultation is the Secretary of State carrying out, and what proposals does he have to enable CABs to provide better legal advice, leading to redress in the courts, for people who find themselves in that position?

Consumers have a right to full information about the goods that they purchase and the choice available. What plans does the Secretary of State have to enforce full and clear labelling on food products? I am thinking particularly about products that may contain genetically modified organisms.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton asked about metric weights and measures. Do the Government intend to pursue the opportunities that they still have to preserve imperial weights and measures at the point of sale for goods that are sold in bulk?

We all welcome the strengthening of consumer protection, but will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what assessment he has made of the additional costs that will inevitably be borne by the taxpayer, and by business?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman welcomed the broad thrust of my proposals, and I welcome the broad thrust of the support that he has expressed.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the role of trade associations. I think it important to make clear what we mean by the seal of approval from the Office of Fair Trading. The code will be purely voluntary. Members of the public will recognise the seal of approval; they will be able to see it clearly in Yellow Pages. It will meet a standard—

Mr. Chidgey: A kitemark?

Mr. Byers: A kitemark, perhaps; call it what you will.

That is the nature of the seal of approval that we want to introduce for businesses that sign up to the code of practice. However, there will still be businesses that do not sign up, and customers will need to be aware that they are dealing with organisations that have not received the seal of approval. The full range of the law will apply to businesses—as it does to all businesses—that fail to deliver on the contracts into which they have entered, and do not provide proper compensation.

The hon. Gentleman asked about trading standards officers. Yesterday, we had a useful meeting with the group representing trading standards officers' organisations, which has been closely involved in the development of the policies in the White Paper.

There remains the question of how we can target the extra funding to ensure that it is used specifically for consumer-related matters. We shall be considering whether we can find a mechanism enabling us to do that, through local authorities, and we shall be engaging in discussions to that effect.

The hon. Gentleman raised the important issue of the role of citizens advice bureaux. No doubt many hon. Members' constituencies contain CABs that play a vital role in the provision of this and other information. We have just allocated an extra £1.3 million to the CABs nationally, so that they can use their computer network to provide advice on consumer matters as well as other issues. The CABs have also been closely involved in the details of the White Paper, along with the Consumers Association. They broadly welcome our approach, and especially welcome the possible opportunity for CABs to get together with other information-providing organisations and to be located in the high street, so that they can give consumers information more readily.

The hon. Gentleman asked about labelling. We insist that any food with GM ingredients in tins and other containers must be clearly labelled: that is the approach that we have taken, and will continue to take.

As for the issue of imperial measures, there is no question of our preventing people from going into a high-street shop in Wallsend and asking for a pound of Cox's apples. We are also ensuring that shops do not suffer an undue burden because of the dual pricing that will be necessary. Consumers will not be affected: they will still be able to ask for a pound of apples, a pint of milk or a pint of beer.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, may I appeal for short, sharp questions—and, of course, short, sharp replies?

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): I wholeheartedly welcome the policy of sanctions against rogue traders. I think that this will be the key legislation in the current Parliament, because the public want change. They want an end to rip-off Britain. But what are we going to do about premium phonelines? People telephone a number, and are ripped off. What are we going to do to stop that?

Mr. Byers: I agree that strong action against rogue traders will make a huge difference to many of those whom we represent. Let me give clear notice that we intend to introduce strong, tough measures, reflecting the wishes of the British people. That will, of course, require legislation. There is nothing worse for a person who works hard all week and then goes out at the weekend to spend some of his own money than to find that he has been ripped off by one of these rogue traders—one of these scam merchants. We will act to stop that.

Premium phonelines are a matter primarily for Oftel, and we are discussing with Oftel how we can improve the present position. As most hon. Members recognise, it needs to be dealt with.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the e-commerce hallmark will include any guarantee of the security of the electronic infrastructure, and what discussions he has had with the industries involved on secure electronic infrastructure? Will he also say whether the better regulation task force has been involved in the White Paper's preparation or will be expected to comment on it? How many deregulation measures does he expect to bring before the Deregulation Committee as a consequence of the White Paper?

Mr. Byers: I think that the hon. Lady will find that the weights and measures consultation document proposes a number of deregulation measures and that it will be very much welcomed by business. The better regulation task force has been fully consulted on the White Paper's details and it is supportive of our proposals.

The e-commerce hallmark is intended to ensure that people know that if they deal over the internet they retain their normal consumer rights. The e-commerce hallmark will address that issue.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I welcome the White Paper. I also very much welcome my right hon. Friend's emphasis in the White Paper on the need to make markets work properly. If we have a choice between competitive markets and overweening regulation, we should realise that consumers are served best by better-working markets.

In recent months, I have been very much involved in the financial services and markets pre-legislative inquiry, which has highlighted the fact that big financial decisions—such as buying a pension or obtaining a mortgage—can not only change consumers' lives but dog them throughout their lives. I hope that the emphasis will be on providing good information to consumers so that they are able to make a reasonable choice. Communication and information are essential for people who, without them, are lumbered with poor deals, poor pensions and poor mortgages.

Mr. Byers: Once hon. Members have had the opportunity to examine in detail the philosophy underpinning the White Paper, I think that they will realise that it very much recognises that consumers benefit when markets work well, and that not only businesses benefit from effective markets. We have no doubt that competition must be the driver in ensuring that consumers get a good deal or that competition creates lasting consumer benefit.

On the specific point about financial services, the White Paper is very clear in stating that those who are considering giving a mortgage, for example, will have to state very clearly the rates of interest that will be charged and present that information in a manner that is easily understood by those who are probably about to embark on the biggest financial transaction that any of us undertake. Those people have to have clear and precise information, and the White Paper proposes measures that will ensure that they are properly informed.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): In his statement, the Secretary of State raised several e-commerce issues. Will he say more precisely how the independent body that he mentioned will be constituted to address those issues? Will he also be more specific about the "knowledge economy" that he mentioned?

Mr. Byers: The knowledge economy is a recognition that whereas, in years gone by, the prime responsibility of business and of Government was to encourage investment in capital such as plant, machinery and equipment, if we are to win in the 21st century, investment will have to be in human capital such as skills, learning, knowledge and education. We have to respond to that priority. However, we are not saying that traditional spheres are not part of the knowledge economy. The hon. Gentleman made a good point in saying that if we are to be really successful we shall have to marry the two together. One of my priorities is to ensure that traditional spheres such as manufacturing both embrace and receive the benefits of the knowledge-driven economy of the future.

The independent body on the e-hallmark will have responsibility for judging whether a business qualifies to receive the hallmark. We think that it is far better if businesses themselves are involved in the process, which we shall have to monitor. The Office of Fair Trading, too, will have a role to play. Nevertheless, that is the role that the independent body will play in ensuring that when we award the e-hallmark for internet trading—whether in the United Kingdom or internationally—people will know that consumer law applying in the United Kingdom will apply also to that transaction.

[Mr. Byers]

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): A great deal was said in May by candidates of all parties for the Scottish Parliament on stronger action against fraudsters, the powers of trading standards officers in local authorities, criminal sanctions and scams. How does this measure fit in with legislation that the Scottish Parliament claims as its own?

Mr. Byers: These are reserved powers, but we will work closely with the devolved Administrations to make sure that our proposals are implemented in a way that is compatible with and supported within them.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that one of the products to be the subject of international price comparison will be the pump price of petrol and diesel? Will he give a further assurance that that will include also comparative rates of tax across the international market?

Will e-hallmarking be carried out by the e-envoy? What happened to the two candidates for e-envoy who were submitted by the right hon. Gentleman's Department to the Prime Minister's office in March? Have they both said they are not willing to take on the job? Does the Secretary of State think that giving a decision to job applicants within a reasonable space of time ought to be part of the new consumer standard?

Mr. Byers: The appointment of e-envoy will be made by the Prime Minister, who will make his decision known in the near future. Petrol and diesel prices are constantly monitored by the European Commission.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Many people in my constituency are fed up to the back teeth with being ripped off by one-day salespeople—for example, table-top salespeople at Cheltenham—and will be encouraged that the Government are at last tackling the problem. Will there be an obligation on one-day salespeople to give prior notification to trading standards officers that they will be in an area? It is all very well talking about criminal sanctions but, by their very nature, those people are literally here today and gone tomorrow. The question of prior notification is central.

Mr. Byers: The people to whom my hon. Friend has referred are well known to trading standards officers, but their frustration at the moment is that they have no effective powers to deal with them. Our measures, which will require primary legislation, will be able to tackle at source the type of activity to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): In his welcome statement, the Secretary of State did not mention counterfeiting or whether he intends to take action on it. When he attacked hotel sales and table-top sales, should he not have put greater emphasis on saying to people, "Buyer beware"? People who buy from reputable retailers have protection, but some take a chance and buy cheaper goods from areas without the protection that we would expect from larger retailers. The right hon. Gentleman will be causing great trouble if he gives the impression today that the Government are able to underwrite every one of the millions of transactions that take place in this country. The one thing that disturbs me about his statement is that he is giving a false impression that somehow the Government will stop all these transactions.

Mr. Byers: If I have given that impression, I now have the opportunity, thanks to the hon. Gentleman, to say clearly that we recognise that the principle of caveat emptor—buyer beware—is important. There is a responsibility on consumers to make sure that they get goods that meet the given description. We believe that we will be able to achieve that only if consumers are informed, knowledgeable and confident, and those principles underpin the White Paper. We are taking action on intellectual property rights and counterfeit, and we are discussing how we can make the provisions in relation to intellectual property more effective.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): Can my right hon. Friend offer an assurance to organisations such as Yellow Pages, which employs 900 people in my constituency, that they can boost and maintain public confidence in themselves and that people who find a service or product through them will be safe from rogue traders?

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend is a great advocate for the important role that services such as Yellow Pages play; they are a great source of convenience. I am pleased to say that there will be a dedicated part of Yellow Pages for those organisations that have received the Office of Fair Trading seal of approval, which will make life easier for the many consumers who have to find a builder, joiner or engineer in a hurry to do work as a matter of urgency.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): We are very grateful for what the Minister said about the proper labelling of foods containing GM products, but is he aware of the widespread abuse of the country of origin labelling of meat products? Meat pies labelled as made in Britain may well contain meat from cows that were grazed and slaughtered in Bolivia and were merely minced in the United Kingdom. Will the White Paper take account of that and put a stop to the abuse? If it does, both consumers and farmers in my constituency will certainly welcome it.

Mr. Byers: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is pursuing that matter and we are raising it in the World Trade Organisation because we think that it must be dealt with internationally. We want the country of origin to be clearly identified.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble): I want to highlight the weakness of the consumer in respect of ancillary services. The White Paper deals with hotel telephone charges. I want to raise the related matter of the problems of mobile home owners. Once they have purchased their home and pay ground rent, they are ripped off for ancillary services. Will my right hon. Friend take that weakness on board when the legislation is introduced?

Mr. Byers: There is specific legislation dealing with the position of the mobile home owner. I listened to my hon. Friend and I will certainly reflect on the need to review the law in the light of the White Paper and the consultations surrounding it.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Will the Secretary of State take on board the fact that if, despite his best intentions, he undermines the principle of buyer beware, the message from today will be beware Byers? Will the Bill become law in time for the next general election and apply to the next Labour manifesto, because many voters regret the fact that it did not apply to the fine print of the current manifesto?

Mr. Byers: We had a raffle about who would be the first to say, "Byers beware" or "Beware Byers"—not a raffle, a guess.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): A sweepstake.

Mr. Byers: Indeed, a sweepstake; thank you so much. I always wondered what role the hon. Gentleman was meant to play on the Front Bench there. He is very helpful and I shall pass a note of thanks to the Leader of the Opposition for so sagely appointing him. I have quite forgotten what the question was now.

I am sure that our manifesto for the next general election will prove as popular and as accurate as the previous one.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): Two weeks ago, Volvo was found guilty of pricing malpractice, and yesterday there was a newspaper headline—"£6 billion rip-off"—referring to the Competition Commission's public hearings about car sales in Britain. Can any action be taken against Volvo under existing law, and will the White Paper help to tackle the enormous scandal of thousands of pounds more being charged for a car in Britain than in European markets?

Mr. Byers: I agree that it is a scandal. It is a matter for regret that the law is ineffective. A whole range of powers will be introduced next year as a result of the Competition Act 1998. Next week we will announce the sanctions that we intend to use under that legislation. They will be significant and will make companies examine carefully their conduct in this important area. I am afraid that the whole Volvo saga shows that the law was deficient and that we need to have new remedies in place. We are providing them in the competition legislation that will come into force next year. The measures in this White Paper will help too.

Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend and his team on today's statement and the White Paper. In particular I welcome the proposed e-commerce code and e-hallmark. Young people in my constituency increasingly buy CDs over the internet from the United States because they are typically 30 per cent. cheaper. I am sure that many more will do so when they have guaranteed consumer rights. I am sure also that American companies will not be slow to apply for our e-hallmark. What can my right hon. Friend do to encourage British companies so that in future my constituents can buy goods over the internet from Birmingham rather than Boston?

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I am pleased that the e-hallmark will be an effective way to give reassurance to people who will increasingly trade and buy goods over the internet. It is already happening with books and, in particular, CDs. I have no doubt that when we can get in place a framework with which consumers feel at ease and so want to deal over the internet, companies and businesses in Birmingham as well as Boston will want to be part of the new information age and the way in which transactions will take place in the 21st century.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will agree that we already have similar types of controls on people such as solicitors and doctors, and he will know how dissatisfied people often are with these controls which are expensive to put in place. Is it not the case that often well-meaning Ministers add additional costs to the honest trader while the dishonest trader gets away scotfree? Clearly, we are trying to help the honest trader to improve trade rather than to penalise him. How will the Secretary of State's magic bullet get over this real problem?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. In drawing up the White Paper we have consulted representatives of the building trade—joiners and so on—to ensure that our proposals go with the grain of what they want. The hon. Gentleman will find that today's proposals have been welcomed. Nevertheless, over the months and years ahead we will continue to work in partnership with legitimate business because in tackling the cowboy builder we do not want to affect the legitimate trader. That is why we will work in partnership with business to make sure that we get it right.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): I thank my right hon. Friend for drawing a line in the sand between Arthur Daley Tory rip-off Britain and new Labour consumer empowerment. Does he agree that the combination of internet sales with the single currency and e-hallmarking will give enormous power to the consumer in terms of relative price comparisons—the single currency makes that easy to see—and quality assurance which we should herald as a great success for Britain?

On a separate issue, can my right hon. Friend give any assurances that he will look into the bundling of products such as mortgages and insurance, which often confuses consumers and leads to excess commissions—indeed, unbundling?

Mr. Byers: On the bundling of financial services, my hon. Friend will be aware that today Mr. Don Cruickshank, who has been heading up the banking review on behalf of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is publishing his interim report which will address some of those issues specifically. We welcome the proposals that he is putting in place which will benefit consumers. The British consumer is already beginning to compare prices. That has been one of the drivers behind today's proposals. That is why we are looking at more than 100 products, comparing prices in the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Germany. That will be of real benefit to British consumers.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does the White Paper deal with the growing problem of unsolicited faxes, which affects thousands of businesses and consumers the length and breadth of the country? Moreover, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this important issue was originally aired earlier this Session in a ten-minute Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser), with warm support from both sides of the House? Given that Members of Parliament, among others, regularly receive a stream of faxes, regrettably sometimes from people who appear to be a sandwich short of a picnic, early action to deal with the problem would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. Byers: There is a regional difference here: it is a pork pie short of a picnic in the north-east of England.

I compliment the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) on his ten-minute Bill, which drew the matter to the attention of all Members of the House. We have been discussing with the director general of Oftel how we can carry this forward. He is putting in place proposals to allow people to secure their fax machines so that they do not receive unsolicited faxes. That is touched on in the White Paper.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): I warmly welcome the fact that we are to tackle the problem of cowboy builders and tradesmen, who are the real despair of many pensioners, especially in my constituency.

Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the real rip-off in our pubs and clubs nowadays is the price of soft drinks? If we compare the prices in the supermarkets with what we are charged in pubs and clubs, it is clear that the typical family in Norfolk is being asked to pay sometimes as much per pint for the child's lemonade as for the father's beer. As we want young people and drivers to drink soft drinks, should not something be done to deal with the rip-off that families currently experience?

Mr. Byers: Those Members of the House who, like my hon. Friend and me, buy just soft drinks will know that the costs are excessive. Many consumers do not realise the cost because they often mix soft drinks with alcoholic ones. It is a real problem. We need to guarantee that prices are posted so that people can see what they are paying. The most effective way to drive down prices is to make consumers aware of what they are paying. That is what we intend to do, and we are discussing with the industry how that can best be secured.

My hon. Friend makes an important point about cowboy builders. They often prey on some of the most vulnerable members of our society. We all know of people, especially pensioners, who have had work done by a builder and have been intimidated when they find that the work has not been done properly. Once we have established the system, they will be able to go to a builder who has the code of approval. They will have the security and assurance of knowing that the person is technically competent and has a financial guarantee to underpin the work.

Points of Order

2.8 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During business questions, my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) raised with the Leader of the House the question of the abuse of privilege in the House. The Leader of the House rightly said that it was a matter for the Chair. I draw to your attention the fact that yesterday the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley) used parliamentary privilege to attack the treasurer of the Conservative party. I understand that on "The World at One" today, the editor of The Times admitted that he had provided at least some of the information that formed the basis of the hon. Gentleman's attack.

Given that this is not the first time that a Member of the House has used parliamentary privilege to be an agent of a national newspaper—the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) was used by The Guardian in the last Parliament—do you consider it time that the House took action to ensure that hon. Members do not allow themselves to be used as pawns for national newspapers seeking to protect the position of their editors by increasing their circulation at the expense of the truth?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): First, I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would have had the courtesy to notify the hon. Member of whom he makes a criticism. Secondly, on the main point made by the hon. Gentleman, the matter is not one for the Chair. If the House wants to change its rules, that is entirely up to the House; it is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Howarth: May I be clear about that, Mr. Deputy Speaker? You suggest that it is not a matter for the Chair, although the Leader of the House said that she thought that that was the case. On a point of accuracy, the right hon. Member for Swansea, West well knows that, on many occasions, I have mentioned his part in the matter that I raised, so I did him no discourtesy. The House will probably agree that the hon. Member for The Wrekin has already done enough discourtesy to the House. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Please let me answer. Regardless of the personal opinions of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), he should always notify an hon. Member of whom he intends to make a criticism. The use of privilege is for hon. Members to consider; it must be used responsibly. It is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On Monday, after the debate on the Railways Bill, and yesterday, in Madam Speaker's ruling on that matter, the Government were pressed to make clear what the progress of the Bill would be. Today in business questions the Leader of the House failed to take the opportunity to do so. Will you please rule, Mr. Deputy Speaker, after due consideration, that, if the Government do not spell out their timetable for the Bill's progress by the time we go into recess, the Bill cannot progress beyond Prorogation in November? May I refer you to the first report of the Modernisation Committee? Paragraph 70 states:

"Any changes proposed in this area of the legislative process must clearly contain stringent safeguards."

The report pointed out that the House of Lords would also have to be involved. Paragraph 102 refers to the need for "the identification by the Government as early as possible of any Bill it wished to be subject to a carry-over procedure."

We have reached the point at which any need for a carry-over procedure for that Bill should be stated. I should be grateful if you would rule on the matter in due course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Once again, that is not a matter for the Chair. Bills die at Prorogation.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have other business to consider.

Mr. Bercow: I am aware of that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for your guidance on that point; however, you will be aware that several right hon. and hon. Members have inquired about the procedure for the handling of legislation. When the issue was raised with Madam Speaker yesterday, she advised Members who were concerned about it to raise the matter with the Leader of the House at business questions.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): No one did.

Mr. Bercow: There was no opportunity to do so.

Can you now advise the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether, in future, it is intended that there should be published criteria according to which Bills will or will not be referred to a Select Committee, and according to which there will or will not be two Second Reading debates rather than one? That information is of the utmost importance, and the Leader of the House is in a position to provide it. May we please have guidance?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only guidance that I can offer the hon. Gentleman is that it is nothing to do with me. The hon. Gentleman may want to take the matter up with the Leader of the House—[Interruption.] Order. The right hon. Lady is a most approachable Minister; the hon. Gentleman should go to see her.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to you for your previous ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I also ask you to guide the House in respect of "Erskine May"? Page 536 of the latest edition states:

"A Commons bill reported from a select . . . committee is normally recommitted to a Committee of the whole House."

Given that the Railways Bill will not come back from the Select Committee for Report until the middle of November, which is effectively the end of the Session, and given that the Bill cannot be amended in the Select Committee, will you please rule that the Bill will require a further Committee stage and that it is therefore bound to die at the end of this Session?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Bill was referred to the Select Committee; it was not committed to the Select Committee.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I apologise for taking up the Chair's time on this highly complex matter. It confuses many of us, although it would not do so if the Government had made their position clear. "Erskine May" refers to a Bill being reported from a Select Committee, regardless of the way in which it went to the Committee in the first place. Whether the Bill is referred or sent to the Committee, the Committee is charged with reporting back to this House. According to "Erskine May", at that point it is required to be "recommitted" to another Committee. In those circumstances, may we have the advice of the Chair on the likelihood that time will run out for the Railways Bill in this Session?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have nothing to add to the advice I have already given the hon. Gentleman. It may not be satisfactory to him, but it is the best that I can offer.

(2) If on the allotted day a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24 stands over to Seven o'clock (or, in accordance with the Order of the House [16 December 1998], Four o'clock), and proceedings on the Employment Relations Bill have begun before that time, or if such a Motion stands over from an earlier day, the Motion for the Adjournment shall stand over until the conclusion of any proceedings on the Employment Relations Bill.

10. If at the sitting today or on the allotted day the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before the time at which any proceedings are to be brought to a conclusion under paragraph 1(1) or (2), no notice shall be required of a Motion made at the next sitting by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

Interpretation

11. In this Order, 'allotted day' means any day on which the Employment Relations Bill is put down on the main business as first Government Order of the Day.

I propose to be extremely brief, as I am conscious that time taken on this debate will be time taken from debate on the measure. The Employment Relations Bill and the Food Standards Bill are important elements of the Government's legislative programme—indeed, both were referred to in our manifesto. Both Bills have already received substantial discussion and consideration in the House. As the whole House will be aware, the Food Standards Bill, in particular, received an unprecedented amount of scrutiny—public consultation, which produced 1,000 replies; a Special Select Committee; a Second Reading; and an ordinary Standing Committee. The Government are now keen to maintain the momentum of the measure.

It was not possible to complete consideration of the Lords amendments to the Employment Relations Bill last night; that is why it was necessary to table an allocation of time motion today. The motion must be seen against the background of a lack of progress and of the difficulties that have occurred throughout the week. I fear that it has become quite clear—

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): As the right hon. Lady was present during the earlier exchanges, will she explain to the House why, at the start of this week, it was necessary to take up a whole day's sitting on a Second Reading of a Bill that clearly cannot progress to fulfilment during this Session? That has now caused the right hon. Lady to introduce a guillotine motion on other important Bills.

Mrs. Beckett: No, I do not propose to get involved in that matter, for the simple reason that, as I have pointed out, I do not want to take time from the matters that we are now discussing—the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman is not one of them. I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends did not have the chance to raise the matter at business questions, but that is not a matter for me. The issue was not raised with me and, consequently, I did not deal with it. [Interruption.] I do not propose to deal with it now, no matter how often it is raised. If hon. Gentlemen want to raise it, they should please not waste the time of the House.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am confused about what happened yesterday to make the right hon. Lady decide to curtail business. She will know that the House expected that the Access to Justice Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I shall not allow hon. Members to mention other Bills. We have an allocation of time—

Mr. Bruce: On timing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have an allocation of time motion before us, which specifically relates to the Food Standards Bill and the Employment Relations Bill. No other Bill should come into that discussion.

Mr. Bruce: I apologise for naming that particular Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, because of the way in which yesterday's business was conducted, both the Leader of the House and I did not actually return from Buckingham Palace in time to vote. We were expecting a vote at 6 o'clock, but the vote took place 20 minutes earlier. The right hon. Lady will probably remember that the second vote was so early that she arrived from the Palace still wearing her hat—looking very elegant. Surely, we were moving faster yesterday and today's guillotine motion is not justified.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman makes some kind remarks, but flattery will get him nowhere.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the specific timing expected for a particular vote, and what that indicated as to the passage of legislation. He alleges that a particular vote was expected for a particular time; that is a matter that relates to the information that he had. I do not want to take up too much time, so I simply say to him and to the House, that, through the week, it had become clear that a small number of Opposition Members were keen to disrupt the smooth passage and progress of business. I make no complaint about that, although it can be annoying to other Members. Such tactics are sometimes regarded as trivial, but they are a perfectly legitimate operation of the Opposition's role and of their rights in the House. I have no quarrel with that whatever.

However, as all hon. Members know, rights involve responsibilities. The Government have a responsibility to protect our business and to see it through and to protect the private Members' business that is set down for consideration tomorrow. That is the last day available to consider private Members' business and many hon. Members hope to see their legislation progress. The hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) raised that matter with me during business questions.

Events throughout the week led to our conclusion that a few hon. Members were keen to slow down progress. Although I recognise that programme motions are preferable to guillotine motions, even if programme motions had been agreed on this legislation—and they were not—we would then have had to ask whether that promise could have been delivered. The Government chose to move this guillotine motion against that background and in the light of events during the past week.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I have listened carefully to the right hon. Lady's comments. Is she suggesting that, because about five Opposition Back Benchers kept Labour Members up until beyond midnight on Monday, she proposes to guillotine the Food Standards Bill—which had Opposition support in Committee, which came out of Committee bang on time and upon which I think the Government will admit they received the full co-operation of my right hon. and hon. Friends? Is that the right hon. Lady's justification for chopping ruthlessly the time allowed for its consideration today?

Mrs. Beckett: We are not chopping it ruthlessly. We have provided adequate time to discuss the Bill and that will occur so long as we do not take up too much time considering this motion. I am well aware of, and the Government recognise, the part played by Opposition Members in the Committee's considerations—in which I understand the right hon. Gentleman also played a distinguished role. It is not a matter of time, or of people being kept up late. The right hon. Gentleman may be aware that, of the nine Divisions that were called on Monday night after a couple of hours of debate, seven related to statutory instruments and all of them had been to Standing Committee and passed unopposed.

Let us not be mealy-mouthed about this. We all recognise and understand the tactics employed—they are legitimate tactics for Opposition Members to use. However, it is equally legitimate for the Government to recognise when they are being used and to take the decisions that a Government must take.

2.22 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): The motion before us would curtail the debate on two Bills—the

[Sir George Young]

Employment Relations Bill and the Food Standards Bill—neither of which we have sought to delay. At no time in her speech did the Leader of the House allege that the Opposition intended to obstruct the measures. These Bills have been caught up in some wider Government agenda—about which they have been less than explicit—which requires some display of virility and the exercise of their majority in this place before we rise for the summer recess.

I shall deal first with the Employment Relations Bill and to the events of yesterday. The House began considering the Access to Justice Bill and the Lords reasons for disagreeing with House of Commons amendments at 3.56 pm. Consideration concluded three hours later after one Division, which was called by the Opposition. There was no delay and no evidence of any obstruction of the Government's business. We then began considering Lords amendments to the Employment Relations Bill at about 7 o'clock. By 10 o'clock, there had been one vote—which we had called—and we had finished considering all the issues in which we were interested, with the exception of two upon which we wanted to have a brief debate and to vote. The rest of the business was Government amendments.

I have looked through yesterday's Hansard to see whether there was any filibustering by my hon. Friends. I saw some references to "The Goon Show" and to "Hancock's Half Hour" but they were made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who also asked whether druids were exempt from the minimum wage. The Secretary of State made the longest speech in the debate leading up to the guillotine announcement. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman was called to order in column 1288 of Hansard for moving away from consideration of the amendment. Only one of my right hon. Friends was called to order, at column 1283 of Hansard, for straying from the subject under consideration. There were no long speeches, only good, serious contributions to the argument.

A 10 o'clock motion on yesterday's Order Paper in the name of the Prime Minister would have enabled the House to sit beyond 10 o'clock, and I have no reason to doubt that consideration of the Bill could have concluded at a reasonable hour. The Order Paper then listed for consideration another Bill, the Contracts (Right of Third Parties) Bill, which is clearly not very important, as it has now disappeared into the spill-over. There was nothing in the conduct of the Employment Relations Bill yesterday to justify imposing a guillotine.

The House did not begin its final deliberations on the Food Standards Bill yesterday because it was due to be considered today. We did not oppose the Bill on Second Reading and we dealt with it in Committee in three weeks, which is a reasonable time scale. I assure the House that the Opposition did not intend to disrupt the passage of the Bill today, and it is simply absurd to imply that we wanted somehow to threaten private Members' business tomorrow.

The Leader of the House asserted yesterday—she repeated that assertion today—that we did not agree to a programme motion. That is a wholly new doctrine: "Sign this programme motion or we will guillotine you." That is not how the business of the House is arranged.

Mrs. Beckett rose—

Sir George Young: Perhaps the right hon. Lady would allow me to finish my point. We gave an undertaking, which I believe that the Government accepted, that we would not delay the passage of the Bill.

Mrs. Beckett: That is not what the Government are saying. If the right hon. Gentleman looks over the pattern of events this Session, he will see that, on the last few occasions when the Government felt obliged to guillotine legislation, we sought programme motions that were refused. When we embarked on the process of debate, there was then substantial delay. So, unfortunately, there is a history of the refusal to agree to a programme motion leading to subsequent delay, which has made it necessary to impose a guillotine.

Although we were only a third of the way down the amendment paper when I made my business statement last night, the right hon. Gentleman makes much of the fact that the Opposition wanted to raise only one or two minor points, which he implies could have been dealt with speedily. Why did no Opposition Member approach the Government side to explain that the Opposition wished to continue for another half an hour, an hour, or whatever? We all know that that is a perfectly ordinary way of discussing and arranging business through the usual channels. However, it was not done.

Sir George Young: The right hon. Lady has raised many points. However, with respect, she did not deal with the final point that I made before her intervention—perhaps because she had decided to intervene before I made it. We gave an undertaking—which I believe that the Government accepted—that we would not delay the passage of the Food Standards Bill. That denies the right hon. Lady's reference to an earlier case, when no similar undertaking was given. In this case, we said that, although we did not agree to a programme motion, we would not delay the passage of the Bill. I believe that that undertaking was accepted.

The Leader of the House said that there was no implied threat. However, she said yesterday:

"It is the Government's lack of certainty about proper progress of business—not just as a result of the official Opposition, although I remind the hon. Gentleman that they did not agree to a programme motion on the Bill—that has led us reluctantly to take this step."—[Official Report, 21 July 1999; Vol. 335, c. 1296.]

That is a clear implication that, if we did not agree to the programme motion, we would expose ourselves to a guillotine. That is not how the House does business, and I hope that we will not be confronted with that sort of argument in the future.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Many hon. Members who were in the Chamber on Monday night witnessed Divisions for two hours—if our constituents had seen it, they would have thought that we were barmy—on issues that had appeared before Standing Committees and been agreed without Divisions. The right hon. Gentleman had no control over the Opposition Whips or his Back Benchers that day. He can do nothing to stop those people disrupting Parliament. The Government have every right to protect the business of the House if he cannot protect us from half a dozen of his Back Benchers.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman has given the game away. The guillotine has nothing to do with these two Bills; it is revenge for what happened on Monday.

The Leader of the House has announced another guillotined debate for next Monday on yet another Bill. So the Government are planning to end the Session in the high-handed, dictatorial manner to which we have become accustomed.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Leader of the House is motivated not by revenge but by judgment, because the Opposition have shown that they are singularly incapable of controlling their own Back Benchers?

Sir George Young: The Government are guillotining discussion on two Bills on which the Opposition have given undertakings. At no time in the speech that we have just heard did the right hon. Lady challenge our undertakings or imply that we were going to obstruct the Bills. As she said yesterday, and as we have heard today, the guillotine has nothing to do with the Bills; it is a result of what happened on Monday. When I asked yesterday what was the reason for the guillotine, the right hon. Lady said:

"Time has been taken up in the House."

One wonders what the House is for if not to take up time.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Is not the right hon. Gentleman embarrassed by the fact that his party is being run by about six or seven vigilantes who are disrupting the business of the House? He ought to be ashamed of trying to defend them.

Sir George Young: That is an absurd allegation about a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends, who take their duties to the House as seriously as did a number of Labour Members during the 18 years when we were in government. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman wants to cast no aspersion on the late Bob Cryer or on the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Is he directing at them the remarks that he has just made about some of my colleagues? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. We cannot have hon. Members shouting across the Chamber.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am sure that, in his study of Hansard, my right hon. Friend will have noticed that, on Monday night, we were having an important debate about an entirely new procedure, which was being invented on the hoof by the Government for their own purposes, and that debate was foreclosed by the Government's action without any attempt to answer the important questions being asked. It is Labour Members who are not taking their responsibilities to the House as seriously as they should.

Sir George Young: I quite agree, and my hon. Friends' reward is simply to be called "vigilantes" by Labour Members.

The reason given by the right hon. Lady last night for the guillotine was that it was in view "of the lack of progress on business this week".

Later, she said that

"it was the progress and the general climate of the handling of business over the week . . . that led to the Government's concern."—[Official Report, 21 July 1999; Vol. 335, c. 1292-95.]

In other words, discussion is being guillotined on these Bills not because the Government are concerned about what might happen to them, but because, as we have heard, the Government wasted Monday on the Second Reading of a Bill that will have to have another Second Reading when we return in November. The House sat late, perfectly legitimately, and not nearly as late as we used to sit in 1979 and 1980, when we had many more late-night sittings. It is deeply disturbing that, after one late night, the Labour Government have overreacted in this way.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): The right hon. Gentleman said earlier that last night's business could and would have been completed by a reasonable hour. In that case, surely six hours is enough time to complete the business today, so why does he not sit down and allow the House to get on with the business in hand?

Sir George Young: The Government are guillotining two Bills. If the hon. Gentleman accepts our undertaking, why is there any need for a guillotine?

The reason for the guillotine dates back to earlier this week, so the Government must have been planning it for some time. Yet, when we had a debate on the summer recess arrangements yesterday morning, there was no mention of the guillotine for the remaining business. The first that I knew about the guillotine was at about seven minutes to 10 last night, which was at about the same time as everybody else. We expect the normal courtesies to be extended if the House is to manage its affairs sensibly. That is simply no way for the Government to treat not only this Opposition party, but the Liberal Democrats, and it is no way to treat the House of Commons. It is not the right arrangement for the measures that we want to discuss.

Mrs. Beckett: I simply remind the right hon. Gentleman, in view of the point that he has just made, that, when I was shadow Leader of the House, I had experience of being in my office and seeing the Leader of the House on the screen telling the House about a guillotine motion, so I had no notice at all.

Sir George Young: The right hon. Lady made it clear that the reason for the guillotine motion was related not to what happened yesterday but to what happened earlier in the week. Against that background, she could have observed the courtesies of letting us know through the usual channels earlier than seven minutes to 10. Her hon. Friends had to call a Division to allow the Government more time to get their act together.

I say to the right hon. Lady that we have helped the Government when they have made a reasonable case. About a fortnight ago, I added my name to a programme motion, so it is nonsense to assert that we do not act reasonably. In the case of the Food Standards Bill, we gave undertakings that the Government accepted.

[Sir George Young]

The guillotine is therefore unnecessary and vindictive. I believe that it an attempt to unite the Labour party after its well-advertised splits and tensions, and it does so at the expense of the freedoms of the House. For those reasons, we shall vote against the motion.

2.35 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I do not intend to follow precisely all the points made by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) because I do not think that repetition will help and it will certainly take time from the debate when our purpose this afternoon is obviously to get on with that debate.

I remind the Leader of the House that my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) asked at business questions specifically about the terms on which guillotine motions are brought before the House. I hope that, if she has time during the summer months, she will reflect carefully not only on those terms but on the consultation that takes place in advance.

Liberal Democrat Members' general approach is that a guillotine motion, which is a sledgehammer, should be used only as a very last resort. The way in which we use them at the moment does no credit to Parliament, individual parties or their individual members. It guarantees less effective scrutiny and less effective legislation, and both Parliament and the public lose out as a result. Moreover, the aggressive antics that inevitably follow such actions are not to the benefit of the reputation of the House or the work that we do.

The Leader of the House made much of what happened earlier this week in justifying the motion. I propose to spend a moment or two on that subject. Surely the aggressive antics that we have witnessed do not justify the particular motion in front of us today. As the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire has said, the origins of the motion lie in the events on Monday night.

I was here throughout those proceedings, and I took part in the debate on the business motion. It became clear in that debate—I hope that, when the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food replies to the debate, he will recognise and respond to this point—that, unless the Minister concerned knows the reason for a business motion, the House will be in a complete state of disarray. It was clear that the Minister for Transport did not know the answers to the questions that were being asked about the business motion. For example, she did not know whether, as a result of the Select Committee inquiry, there would be a second Second Reading. She did not know what would happen at prorogation. She did not know whether Standing Committee proceedings would follow.

The failure of those on the Treasury Bench to give adequate answers to important questions that were asked by hon. Members on all sides of the House resulted in a mess. Frankly, the events of Monday night were absurd, but the Government must take responsibility for failing to explain what would happen.

The Leader of the House has made much this afternoon about the progress of business through the House. All that happened on Monday night was that some of the usual hooligans—the term "vigilantes" is too much of a compliment—sought to disturb the business of the House. In the previous Parliament, the hooligans were members of the right hon. Lady's party; such people are a fact of parliamentary life. However, on Monday night, the hooligans had some justification for their actions, in that, at the end of the debate, there was no conclusion. The Whips moved a closure motion, but no answers had been given to the questions that had been asked. There had been a failure in communication.

I hope that, this afternoon, closure will not again be moved before the Minister has responded to the proper issues raised by those of us who want to improve the way in which the House deals with business.

I can only concur with the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire about the panic business statement last night. We witnessed the charade of Labour Back Benchers forcing an entirely absurd Division so that the Leader of the House could arrive with an adequate statement. There was a complete lack of consultation. The right hon. Gentleman and I stood by the Dispatch Box just before the business statement was made and were told what it might contain. We had no opportunity to conduct proper consultation or find out whether we could agree on a process that would help the House to deal effectively with its business.

In an intervention, the Leader of the House implied that she was simply following the bad example of her Conservative predecessors. For goodness' sake—if we develop on that basis, the modernisation of the House will go into reverse. Taking a bad example from the past and adopting it as the process for the future—

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I am grateful to the Liberal Democrat Chief Whip for giving way, and I am very excited to hear his opinion that he and the Conservative Front Bench spokesman should consult on these matters, but the House is the representative institution for much more than Front Benchers. It must also enable Back Benchers to express their views. Back Benchers, I regret to observe across 20 years, are not always ad idem with the views of their party's Front Benchers, and that will apply to the Government as well as to the Opposition. If it is just a cosy-up between three Front Benches, where is the interest of constituents throughout this country protected, and where is the opportunity for Back Benchers to pursue an interest that may seem minor in the great scheme of things but is of great importance to their area or constituency?

Mr. Tyler: I welcome that intervention because I entirely agree with it. The way in which on-the-hoof decisions are sometimes taken, even when the bipartisan usual channels are in operation, does not help the House to do its business in a way that is to the service of all our constituents. That is why short notice is, by its very nature, the antithesis of good consultation.

I happened to be sitting in my office watching the debate, and at 9.55 pm I happened to see the text come up at the bottom of the screen, saying that there would be a business statement at Ten o'clock. I had no foreknowledge. For the Leader of the House to tell us that, on a previous occasion, she sat in her office and was told nothing, is merely to suggest that no lessons have been learned from the mistakes of the past. Two wrongs do not make a right; surely we should know that. I hope that there will be no repeat of that.

It is extremely important to bring one piece of information before the House. I understand that the Conservative party was offered a programme motion—no one has yet denied that. However, I do not know the terms of that motion, or whether the Conservatives turned it down flat and were not even interested in talking about it. If so, I think that we should know. I, on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, was never even offered the opportunity to comment on a programme motion. We would have been very sympathetic to it.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and I are both members of the Modernisation Committee, so he knows that I welcome sensible discussion in advance of business. I should like there to be a business committee to take over that responsibility, so that we do not have to rely on the usual channels. By definition, in a House that is now multi-party, a two-way conversation, with one person saying yes and another person saying no, is also the antithesis of good consultation of the whole House, and we must get away from it.

That may be necessary in exceptional circumstances—

Mr. Maclean: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No; I want to make progress, because I want to get on to the debate.

Mr. Maclean: On that point.

Mr. Tyler: The right hon. Gentleman may make his point in due course. I am sure that it is vital, but, even so, I want to make progress.

In my book, there is a very important difference, not of degree but of substance, between a programme motion, which is agreed to, and an imposed guillotine, which by definition is disagreed to. I hope that we shall find ways to develop the former, so that the opinions of those in all parts of the House have a better opportunity of feeding into the way in which we conduct business.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire has mentioned the two Bills that are the subject of the timetable motion. Throughout yesterday evening, I carefully watched the way in which the Employment Relations Bill was debated. For once, the ingenuity of the Opposition was comparatively brief. The ingenuity of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was, uncharacteristically, extremely long winded. Any complaint about progress on the Bill should therefore have been directed by the Leader of the House at her colleagues, not at the Opposition. My hon. Friends were extremely brief.

As far as I can judge, the Government amendments were comparatively straightforward. They were also comparatively welcome to the Opposition and, to a considerable extent, they tidied up some inconsistencies that had been left by the Committee.

The House had not had an opportunity to judge whether there would be major problems on the Food Standards Bill. It had not been put to the test. All the signs were that there would not be major problems unless some of the Conservative Back-Bench hooligans had subtly thought up some new problems and wanted to cause trouble, in which case I am sure that we could have relied on the good offices of the shadow Leader of the House to keep them firmly under control. He is a firm disciplinarian, as we shall discover in a few minutes.

This is a test of the Conservatives' sincerity. If several Conservative Members pop up in a minute, and go on in a way that one or two of them can, we shall know that there is some hypocrisy among those on the Conservative Benches, because the important issue is surely to make progress on the Bill.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: No; I am making progress.

I believe that last night's events very seriously—I hope not permanently—undermined cross-party co-operation on progress on business. We have made some real progress in this Parliament. The Government have been forthcoming with the programme motions following the advice of the Modernisation Committee. However, there must be real progress hereafter, and I hope that we shall find that last night's events were an aberration, not the pattern of what is to come.

The Food Standards Bill covers important matters, and I do not propose to speak for much longer. The Food Standards Agency is supported by Members in all parts of the House and by the wider public. There will be important issues to discuss, but I am confident that the Government will be forthcoming in meeting some of the concerns of my right hon. and hon. Friends as well as of the Conservative Opposition, not least in relation to smaller enterprises.

I hope that we shall avoid a full three-hour harangue. That is where the discipline of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire will come into play. Yes, in the past, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has provided the hooligan element. Yes, in the present, the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) does much the same thing. However, this afternoon is a test of the ability of the House of Commons to deal with an issue on which we basically have no fundamental political differences, and I very much hope that we can now get on with it.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): I shall be brief. I want to share with the House the confusion that I felt, as a new Member, about the attitude of the Chamber to time. A historical convention seems to have developed whereby time is the only weapon available to the Opposition and to Back-Bench Members. That is a foolish weapon. The time has come for us to give Back-Bench and Opposition Members other opportunities to influence the progress of legislation.

It seems to me peculiar that, when issues are raised by those who are not members of the Government, usually the only vote that we may have is on whether the House shuts down its business completely. That does not sufficiently respect the interests of our electors or of those on the Government Back Benches, which might sometimes differ from the interests of those on the Front Bench. In a Chamber where the only weapon of anyone who has any criticism is time, Ministers naturally desire to keep their Back Benchers silent.

[Fiona Mactaggart]

It is time that we grew up and that we admitted that we all have an interest in representing the interests of our constituents and advancing the programmes on which we were elected. It is time to consider mechanisms that can better achieve those aims.

Interestingly, we used such mechanisms to some extent in the case of one of the Bills that is subject to the allocation of time motion—the Food Standards Bill. The Bill was introduced relatively late, but it received pre-legislative scrutiny, which fundamentally changed it on an issue on which the Opposition led the charge, but about which many Labour Back Benchers shared their concerns: the poll tax to fund the Food Standards Agency. Because that was done intelligently, we won on that issue without there being a great row.

The problem with the fact that the only weapon that is available to us in this place is time is that it encourages tribalism. It says, "This side are the good guys and that side are the bad guys," or vice versa. That may very well—

Mr. Shepherd: I appreciate that the hon. Lady is concentrating on time. Does she agree that time can be used to enable intelligent Members of Parliament, also trying to represent their constituents, to employ the device of intelligent, rational argument by which, if there is a problem, one unpicks a contention within a Bill? This guillotine motion, or any guillotine motion, is designed to curtail that opportunity. The hon. Lady's rationale does not address what is central to the purpose of the House of Commons—not this foo-fa of good will and good intent, but the detail of analytical and rational argument, dealing with the content of a Bill.

Fiona Mactaggart: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making an important point. By regarding time in the Chamber as the only valuable time, we do not get rational debate. We sometimes endure midnight chunterings, which are not examples of thoughtful and rational debate. Would we not be better off if we genuinely provided time to enable analytical, thoughtful debate to take place, to which I know the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) is committed? Such debate could make a difference and not simply provide the opportunity to bore and tire those on the other side of the Chamber into submission. We could actually change things. I think that the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills and I are united in believing that that is our job in this place. We could do our job better if we had a more modern and grown-up attitude to time.

We should programme every Bill and we should know when the House will be in recess well in advance. I come from a tradition that knows that the pressure of the deadline often produces better work. However, we should focus on opportunities to debate that can produce thoughtful, intelligent and better responses, rather than indulging in ritual tribal warfare that degrades the Chamber.

2.52 pm

Mr. James Paice (South–East Cambridgeshire): The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said that time-wasting last night stemmed very much from Labour Members. At 9.58 pm they called a wholly unnecessary Division. They had to produce two Labour Back Benchers as stooges to be the Tellers because there was a zero Opposition vote. That Division occupied 12 minutes, which perhaps enabled the Leader of the House to get her act together. I cannot help but wonder how much more of the meat of the debate could have been dealt with in that 12 minutes.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paice: I will happily give way to the hon. Gentleman, but before I do, I suggest that over the coming weekend or during the summer recess, he has a chat with his father, who was a past master at prolonging debate unnecessarily.

Mr. Hoyle: I do not have the opportunity to get a word in with my father.

To say that no Opposition Members voted in the Division to which the hon. Gentleman refers is not quite correct. I think that he will find that two of his hon. Friends went through the Opposition Lobby. They realised that they had made a mistake and went back through the other side of the Lobby to cancel their votes. How does the hon. Gentleman explain that?

Mr. Paice: Hansard records in column 1291 that there were no "Noes". There were just two Tellers. If Members had gone through the Lobby and had been head counted, they would have been recorded as having voted. It is as simple as that.

I wish to underline what a shambles the Government have made of taking the Food Standards Bill through its parliamentary stages. As the Leader of the House has said, it is one of the Government's flagship Bills. The Labour party heralded it in its manifesto and it has not been opposed by any Opposition party.

Let us reflect on what has happened in the Government's handling of a flagship policy. The White Paper, on which the Bill was to be based, was published in early 1998. It was very welcome. It then went out to consultation. We were promised the draft Bill in the summer of 1998, after consultation had taken place. We did not get it until February 1999. The Government, properly, suggested that it should receive pre-legislative scrutiny. That was a sensible approach to the consideration of such a Bill and I have no criticism of that. However, the Government sought to complete that scrutiny in only seven weeks.

It is worth referring to what the Special Select Committee that scrutinised the Bill said. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who chaired the Committee, is no longer in his place. It should be borne in mind that that Committee was massively dominated by Labour Members. It stated:

"This period of just over seven weeks is by any standards a very short one for an inquiry by a Parliamentary committee."

Paragraph 8 reads:

"Given the way in which a select committee undertakes an inquiry, by requesting written evidence, taking oral evidence, and finally producing a report, it is clear that seven weeks is a far from ideal amount of time. We are concerned that this first exercise in ad hoc committee pre-legislative scrutiny should have taken place under difficult time constraints".

It was flagged up clearly at that stage that even Labour Members felt that the Government were not providing enough time for the Bill.

There were the usual discussions through the usual channels immediately after Second Reading. I do not think that I am giving away any secrets when I say that the Labour usual channels wanted the Bill to be considered in Standing Committee in only one week, on the basis that there had been pre-legislative scrutiny.

The Select Committee that considered the Bill did so carefully and its report is an ideal example of what can be achieved. It produced recommendations relating to the principal issues arising from the Bill. It did not go through it line by line in the technical way that a Standing Committee does, but made a number of proposals. In one instance, thankfully, the Government accepted that Committee's advice and backed down on charging. If we have time this afternoon, we shall debate the Meat Hygiene Service, which is a clear example of the Government taking no notice of the Standing Committee's advice, or not responding to it properly.

It has been widely accepted that in Committee we addressed the issues constructively. Where we felt that specific issues had been debated thoroughly, we withdrew or did not even move amendments later in the proceedings, so that we might move on without rehashing old arguments.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): To complete the picture, I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that only eight of the original 42 clauses remained unamended and survived the draft of the Bill that we considered in Committee. The vast bulk of the draft Bill had been amended.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has considered these matters carefully. She makes the point that the Standing Committee had to scrutinise the Bill that was before it, which was not the same as the draft Bill originally presented. Some of the changes were welcome because they were responses to the recommendations of the Select Committee. That did not mean that the Standing Committee did not have a responsibility to examine the Bill.

On specific issues, we wanted more scrutiny. We said that we would raise those matters on Report. Last night, the Leader of the House accused me of not being present at business questions and suggested that I should have asked for more time to consider the Bill during previous business questions. However, there was no need to do that; we thought that we would have a full day on Report, with perhaps an extra hour or two hours. The right hon. Lady has implied that that would be perfectly acceptable. Six, seven or eight hours would have been adequate for what we were planning to do in raising certain issues.

If we had known that the Bill would be guillotined, we would have explored some of the key sections of the Bill rather more deeply in Committee. As it is, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) said, we delivered the Bill as we said we would. At the end of three weeks in Committee, we had not run over time. Indeed, we finished with about an hour to spare. No one can suggest that three weeks in Committee—only 11 sittings—is a sign of time-wasting.

The amendments and new clauses selected for consideration today are set out on one side of one sheet of paper. They are fairly well spaced out. There are not huge groups of amendments, as we sometimes see in other selection lists. Often, we find huge groups of Government amendments. Only 35 amendments were tabled and they were not all selected for debate. Three new clauses were tabled, one of which was not selected, and the Government tabled a new schedule. There are 13 groups on the selection list, one having been tabled by Plaid Cymru. As Plaid Cymru was not represented in the Committee, it should have the right to bring its amendments to the Floor of the House. One amendment was tabled by a Labour Back Bencher, supported by a couple of Liberal Back Benchers. That can hardly be laid at the door of the Opposition. Two groups of amendments are Government concessions, which we welcome, and one group consists of miscellaneous and drafting amendments.

No objective person would classify the amendments and new clauses tabled for this afternoon as time-wasting. Why should we waste time? We are not against the Bill. We support the principle. It now seems unlikely that we will reach all the major issues dealt with in the groups of amendments, in particular the Meat Hygiene Service, which we discussed to a degree—

Mrs. Beckett: I shall take only a second. The hon. Gentleman says that hon. Members wanted a day to debate the Bill and that that would have been adequate. A normal parliamentary day is six hours, and six hours is what the motion allows. He is not debating the Bill, but that is his choice.

Mr. Paice: If the right hon. Lady had listened, she would know that I said about a day, or six, seven or eight hours, which for many years has been a more typical day. Six hours is the minimum—

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Leader of the House is trying to suggest to the House, as did the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) in his sanctimonious speech, that somehow it is improper to take time debating one of the most vicious and ruthless guillotines that I have experienced in 16 years in the House. Owing to the way in which the guillotine motion has been drafted by the Government, of course time spent on it will take time out of the debate, but God help this House if the Government say that we cannot discuss guillotines in future because that is inappropriate and takes time out of important debates.

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend makes a valid point. I am certain that, if challenged, the right hon. Lady could not name a guillotine motion in the 18 years of the previous Government on which the Opposition did not speak, or which they allowed to go through on the nod, as she implied by her comments today.

I limit my remarks to the Food Standards Bill. The legislation has been welcomed across the political spectrum, by outside bodies ranging from the National Farmers Union to the National Consumer Council—the entire spectrum of the food industry. They would be horrified by the arrogance of the Government in trying to rush through a Bill that must be right if the agency is to have the credibility that everyone wants it to have.

The Minister of State said that the agency will be the most powerful quango in the land—it may well be. Surely that justifies our demand that the Bill should be properly examined. If the Government do not want it to be scrutinised, that is an indictment of their approach to the House and to legislation.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Paice: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall conclude in a moment. I am sure that he will have a chance to speak later.

When I entered the House, it was the convention that Bills were not timetabled—guillotined—until they had had 100 hours in Committee. That is not so long ago, and certainly well after both the Leader of the House and the Minister of State entered the House; they both preceded me by some years. Now it seems that the Government are riding roughshod over democracy in order to get their way.

Last night the right hon. Lady said that the Government needed certainty. That is the language of dictatorship, not of democracy. In any event, she has that certainty. It is represented by the hundreds of grinning eunuchs on the Benches behind her, who are not prepared to undertake proper scrutiny of the Bill, which it rightly deserves and which consumers throughout the country expect it to have.

3.3 pm

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): What a charade this is. We have already taken almost an hour on the allocation of time motion, and we have only six hours to debate that and substantive issues. It is clearly a case of arrogant self-indulgence from a few egos on the opposition Benches. Such enormous time-wasting is essentially anti-democratic. We know that we have only six hours. The posturing and pomposity of Opposition Members will make no difference to that. I am sick of listening to synthetic emotion from hon. Members who are incapable of making speeches less than 10 minutes long.

We need proper timetabling in this place, similar to the sittings motion before consideration of the Finance Bill, so that people will not jump up on their hind legs and speak for 20 minutes or half an hour about nothing. That is a waste of the time available to us and an example of end-of-term public school spirit on the part of the Opposition.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) let the cat out of the bag when he said last night—

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: Hold on. I will give way in a moment. The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire said that the business last night was in good order and could have been completed by a reasonable hour. It follows logically from that that we could easily complete the business today within six hours. That is ample time, which is why so much time is being wasted by Opposition Members, and here is another one of them.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am exceptionally grateful to the gracious Member for giving way. I hope that he will apologise to the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) for his attack on public school people, given that she is a product of Cheltenham Ladies college.

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that throughout the period of Labour opposition—18 long years, throughout which I was in the House—every guillotine motion was debated in full? Were his right hon. and hon. Friends guilty of synthetic fury?

Mr. Davies: I am glad to say that my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) contained her remarks within less than five minutes. I hope to do the same.

As regards guillotines, the point backfires. The number of guillotines imposed by the previous Government was enormous. That shows the contradictory position of the Opposition now, when they jump up and down. Why do we not get on with the business in hand and discuss the Bills on the Order Paper?

3.6 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): It was the Lords amendments to the Employment Relations Bill that I addressed at about 6.50 pm yesterday. That business has been lost, although we could have completed it last night. [Interruption.]

I am asked why I am speaking from the Back Bench. I am doing so in order to contribute and to put on the record of the House the reason why an important Bill—a Government Bill—was thwarted by the Leader of the House at 10 pm last night.

As a member of the Conservative Front-Bench team, I co-operated with the Labour Whips to an extent that is probably unprecedented. Before I took my place last night, I had already indicated to the Whips that I would be quite happy for the first two groups of Lords amendments to be nodded through. I had indicated on the amendment paper the areas of debate on which I wanted to concentrate, and I had given every indication that the work last night could be concluded in good time.

There were, as the House knows, 19 sets of grouped Lords amendments, but only five amendments had been tabled to those amendments. Two had been tabled by my hon. Friends and me, one had been tabled by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and two more had been tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and cross-party members of the Intelligence and Security Committee.

I made it clear to hon. Members on both sides of the House that we would conclude the business last night. I also made clear the aspects that warranted discussion. There were two aspects in particular. One was the amendments tabled by the Intelligence and Security Committee, which took only three quarters of an hour to debate and were not pressed to a Division, despite the fact that the relevant Lords amendments were tabled very late in the progress of the Bill and had not been subject to debate or scrutiny in Committee either in this House or in another place.

Those amendments had important security implications for the country. The hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) uses dismissive language about the tenor of the debate. Had she been in her place last night, she would know only too well that in our discussion of the Employment Relations Bill last night, we concentrated on matters of national security and on the other matter, relating to clause 15, on which ministerial commitments made in another place about amendments on Report had not been forthcoming.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Lady misunderstood me. I made no dismissive remarks about last night's debate. Indeed, I was extremely interested in the proposals from the Intelligence and Security Committee. Had I been able to be present, I would have been in the Chamber for that debate.

My concern is that the House seems to have developed a habit recently of having, very late at night—[Interruption.] My constituents think that after 10 o'clock at night is a funny time to do one's work. The House has developed a habit of engaging very late at night in debates that are ridiculous rituals. If we held our debates earlier in the day, they might be less so.

Mrs. Browning: Of the 19 groups of amendments scheduled for debate last night, we completed six, the first two of which I agreed to nod through. But the two which took up the substantive amount of time were the two that I mentioned—one relating to national security matters raised by the Intelligence and Security Committee, which should have had proper scrutiny, and the other to clause 15, on which the House divided because commitments made by Ministers in the other place had not been honoured. It was when we then moved on at approximately 9 o'clock that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry decided to share with us, amusing as it was for those of us who were present, anecdotes about Spitfire pilots and scenes from "Hancock's Half Hour". From 9 o'clock onwards, it was clear that the Government Front-Bench spokesmen were under instruction to filibuster.

Mr. Clive Betts (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): Rubbish.

Mrs. Browning: I did everything that I could to co-operate with the hon. Gentleman's colleagues. At one stage, I referred one of his colleagues to other channels. I am not other channels, but, being in charge of the legislation, I was convinced that we could conclude it satisfactorily. Without the intervention of the Leader of the House at 9.50 pm, we would probably have concluded the Bill, including one more vote, by 10.30 pm. For that business to be lost to the House last night and deferred until next Monday was unnecessary.

Mr. Tyler: If it was not an intentional filibuster, it was certainly an effective unintentional filibuster. If the Government were not under instruction, they seemed to be doing it anyway, which seems an extraordinary situation. The credibility of what the Government have said has surely been blown to smithereens by their subsequent action of calling an absurd Division.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman says that it was a filibuster; it certainly developed in that way. However, those of us who set out in good faith on the next group of amendments had no idea that it was to be turned into a filibuster by no less a person than the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

How shall we be able to accept the Government's word during future legislation? Knowing how to allocate one's time effectively in order to give due consideration to those issues that require it is becoming a pretty precarious business.

Dealing with amendment No. 17 last night I said:

"I will be happy to allow speedy progress on some amendments on the Order Paper, but not amendment No. 17. What has happened as a result of the amendment bears full examination."—[Official Report, 21 July 1999; Vol. 335, c. 1262.]

Throughout the evening I gave every indication of where I needed to spend time on matters of substance while reinforcing the message that, where we could make rapid progress, we would.

There still seems to be something of a mystery about the Government's agenda last night in curtailing progress on the Bill. Having voted to overturn a Lords amendment, it is clear that, even when we dispatch the Bill on Monday, it will have to go back to the other place.

Matters of great importance arise here, such as the timing of the application of the legislation for industry and employment. Given that the Government's excuse seems to be that they were all tired after Monday, the only conclusion to which I can come is that they were not only tired but pretty emotional as well.

3.15 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): Under the new Labour Government, guillotine motions are becoming increasingly ritualistic. The Leader of the House and I have voted long and often against the principle and employment of guillotine motions as an instrument of Executive abuse of process. The House, as a collective body of elected representatives, can only attest, or assent—if it is a higher order of attestation—to the proposals brought before us for consideration.

I felt for the Leader of the House because, towards the end of any Session, with the pressure of the necessity of returning to our constituencies and giving our constituents undivided attention for 14 weeks, the Government naturally want to ensure that they have secured all aspects of their business.

The Leader of the House tried to negotiate that concept, and adduced arguments which were essentially arguments of divination. I say divination, because as one reads the arguments that the right hon. Lady adduced last night, and which my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) cited, they have a curious ring. The right hon. Lady said:

"We have had a substantial amount of time wasted—[HON. MEMBERS: "What?"]—yes, wasted, although I accept not necessarily by the official Opposition as such. Time has been taken up in the House."—[Official Report, 21 July 1999; Vol. 335, c. 1292.]

In the exchange that the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) was kind enough to allow me to pursue with her, I thought that we accepted that Members of Parliament have the right to try to express arguments on details, which are often outside the consultations. Therefore, any hon. Member can anxiously wait for an opportunity to rise on a clause which might be dismissed by a guillotine motion.

A generation ago and before, guillotine motions were looked upon as something shocking because they are the denial of freedom of speech. They may have something to do with the enormous legislative programmes that modern

[Mr. Richard Shepherd]

Governments seek to carry through. To list such programmes is almost the parliamentary equivalent of soundbites. From my own memory, I can recall a previous distinguished Prime Minister—to put it that way—who was elected on the basis that we have far too much legislation, coming to the Conservative 1922 Committee and cheering us, with a ringing affirmation, for passing 44 pieces of legislation during our first period of government. "Jolly good," the Prime Minister called out, then added, ominously, "but we can do better."

The claim to reduce the burden of legislation going through the House was in the Conservative party's election manifesto. But within one brief parliamentary Session that was out of the window and we were into the business of proclaiming how many pieces of legislation we had scuttled through the House.

Nearly 20 years later, a new Government have come in, and what is one of their most ringing cheers? Of course, they have to clear up the detritus, the misgovernment of Britain for 2,000 years, the misappropriation and all the rest. I seem to recall that one of the current Prime Minister's ringing and cheering assertions to the nation is of 52 pieces of legislation.

Perhaps the House and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will forgive me for just reflecting on what is the point of a Queen's Speech. It cites 16 or 18 pieces of legislation, but no longer reflects what we shall all be condemned to doing in the House during the next 12 months. I make those observations because they affect why the House sometimes becomes tense over the progress of Bills through the Chamber. That is really what this is about.

Why did I say that the Leader of the House was into divination? Although the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) made a very sour speech, if I may be allowed to say so, it is probably agreed by Members on both sides of the House that, on reflection, genuine questions were not answered. For example, although I try to follow such matters, I have no certainty about how one moves amendments in a Select Committee. So we come to the guillotine motion; in a sense, it is addressing the failure to satisfy the House on Monday. [Interruption.] I see that the usual channel has absented himself from the corner of the Chamber which he occupies.

The motion contains one of the features that we have taken up a number of times. It would not be true to say that those on the Treasury Bench invented the device of including the three hours, as set down in the Standing Orders, for discussions on guillotine motions within the overall time allocated for consideration of a Bill. I regret that that happened on one occasion that I can identify before 1997. However, the toy that has been given to the Government means that that is becoming a standard feature of guillotine motions. That is why I am very disappointed in the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). I do not want to detract from the fact that he made a very good speech but hon. Members should note that, having almost completed it, he turned round and said, "But I hope no one else will cause any obstruction by making a speech, because we want to be able to discuss the merits of the Bill."

Mr. Maclean: Sanctimony.

Mr. Shepherd: I shall not go as far as saying that that remark was a little sanctimonious. The hon. Member for North Cornwall was saying, "I am quite prepared to be coerced by guillotine motions of this nature." To pursue his argument, we must ensure that the Government are ashamed of encompassing substantive argument on a Bill within the time allowed for a guillotine motion.

Mr. Tyler: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to know that during my previous sojourn in this place in 1974, throughout the period of the Conservative Government and during this Parliament I have always voted against guillotine motions on principle.

Mr. Shepherd: I am very cheered by that enunciation and I hope that it becomes part of the Liberal party's programme. I would say that, wouldn't I? However, I recall that the hon. Gentleman came close to falling into the hands of Lucifer over the absurd provisions of the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, which the House considered last September. Not only was he not going to vote against the guillotine motion, but he actually signed it. Fortunately, the good and intelligent argument of his own colleagues and other Members of the House convinced him that it was inappropriate for him to sign that motion. In one of the most touching moments that I have ever witnessed in the House, a signatory to a motion on the Order Paper—presumably, signing the motion reflected a considered position—withdrew his support by standing up and saying, "I withdraw my signature." I do not condemn that, because we sometimes change our opinions. After all that the hon. Member for Slough has said on that point of rational argument, I accept it; I sometimes have my mind changed.

The point that I want to make is about a three-hour guillotine motion encompassing argument on the substantive legislative issues before the House and I hope that the Government—and the usual channel, who unfortunately is not in his usual place—will take it on board. In truth, using that little device does no Government any credit. Either the Government want to give us three hours' debate on these matters or they want to give us six. Surely they do not want to coerce us into surrendering a proper debate about whether the allocation of time is adequate. That is what we are discussing.

The divination to which I referred is in the words of the Leader of the House, who said:

"The course of events over this week led the Government to have some anxiety about the progress of the Food Standards Bill."

This matter has nothing to do with the Food Standards Bill itself and, by a process of divination, the right hon. Lady knows that the character of certain Members makes it unsuitable for them to be permitted to address it. Why do I say unsuitable? Because she said that time had been wasted

"not necessarily by the official Opposition as such."

How gracious; now we are allowed—as an official Opposition, no less—to be commended for the way in which we discharge our business, although the hon. Member for Croydon, Central does not believe that there is merit in that position.

"It is no good hon. Members asking questions if they do not want to listen to the answer."

She was saying, "We'll guillotine it if necessary." She went on:

"The Opposition have every right to use time in the House"—

That was very big of her—

"that is their legitimate right".

She then talked about

"the duty of the Government".—[Official Report, 21 July 1999, Vol. 335, c. 1292.]

I know that after 10 o'clock we are all driven to make some absurd comments, but the particularisation and characterisation, which I think are wrong, is that any Member, however humble or however recently elected, can be guillotined out of the way.

Acceptance of the Food Standards Bill is what is behind the motion. I have no way of testing this until the debate has finished, but when the guillotine falls we may have three hours, less up to 20 minutes for a Division, to debate the Bill. That means that the Government consider only two hours and 40 minutes to be appropriate for such a debate. I do not believe that a Bill that has received almost universal support and attracted the good will of Members on both sides of the House should be treated so casually. However, the Government are not treating the Bill casually; they are treating casually the right of those who send us here to represent them to have their say.

Perhaps the 52, 54, 56 or 57 pieces of legislation that the Government hope to pass next year should be viewed by their business managers with a much more jaundiced eye. Good government in this country means, by and large, a sense of fairness and recognition that other people sometimes have different views. The motion should be opposed, because it strikes at freedom of speech and exerts the absolute control of the Executive over the Chamber.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): The motion before the House is intolerant and it has been tabled by a Government who are becoming increasingly intolerant. I exempt from that accusation the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Minister for Public Health because of their behaviour and demeanour in Committee when we were discussing the Food Standards Bill. They behaved with exemplary courtesy and were grateful for some of the contributions from the Opposition; I think they said that some of those contributions helped. I feel that I know the Minister of State slightly better than I know the Minister for Public Health, and I cannot imagine that he is behind the tabling of the motion.

The Minister of State was probably as appalled as the rest of us last night when he discovered what was going to happen today. The motion is certainly not his style, considering the way in which he handled proceedings in Committee. I would be the first to acknowledge that his patience would soon run out if there was one second of time-wasting today and we did not make proper progress on the Bill. He would be calling on the business managers to use a guillotine motion to get the Bill through the House.

However, that is not the scenario. The Employment Relations Bill and the Food Standards Bill are being guillotined not because there was one second's time wasting by the official Opposition, the Liberal Democrats or anyone else, but because the Leader of the House, the Chief Whip and the business managers concluded that the climate during the conduct of other business in the week indicated—as my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said, the Leader of the House concluded through divination—that the Food Standards Bill might be delayed, or filibustered. That is an extraordinary way in which to run business in the House.

Mr. Drew: Is the right hon. Gentleman seriously asking Labour Members to accept that he would not have been filibustering last night in advance of his filibuster on Friday on the Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill?

Mr. Maclean: I can give an absolute assurance that I would not have spoken at all last night. I did not have a particular interest in the Bill. One cannot be a specialist—one cannot be an amateur—on every Bill before the House, so I had no intention of speaking last night.

I had intended to speak on the Food Standards Bill today. I assumed that it would kick off at about 2.30 and finish about 7, 7.30 or 8; that would be the normal amount of time. I also assumed that, if we finished at 8 o'clock on Thursday night, that was not too late for the precious luvvies and darlings on the Labour Benches, who seem to wilt and to turn into pumpkins if we go beyond 10 o'clock.

I do not intend to do any filibustering on Friday. In fact, if I did filibuster, Mr. Deputy Speaker would be ruthless in pulling me up. I may have one or two points to make on other Bills, but that is an entirely different matter.

I get back to the point of the guillotine. It has been introduced because, on Monday night, some Divisions were called by some Opposition Back Benchers. Because of those Divisions, proper sensible debate on the Employment Relations Bill and on the Foods Standards Bill will be ruthlessly curtailed.

What happened on Monday night? I agreed with much of the speech of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), but take issue with two little points. On Monday night, the Minister for Transport failed to respond to the points in the debate and then, all of a sudden, decided to move the closure. One of my hon. Friends had given way to the Minister or a Government Whip, and suddenly the Minister or the Whip moved that the question be now put, without us hearing a cheep from the Minister in response to any of the crucial questions that had been asked. Those questions were crucial because, in opening the debate, the Minister for Transport had not a clue what would happen.

I assume that the reason was not the briefing because the civil service cannot have gone downhill that much in two years; I assume that the Minister had been given, as usual, excellent briefing. Why she decided not to use it, or not to call for answers from the Box, is beyond me. Because there was no response and because the closure had been moved, I, with other Opposition Back Benchers who were annoyed at the lack of a proper response, forced a Division.

[Mr. Maclean]

What else can an Opposition do? What else can individual Members do when we make serious points in a debate and then find that there is no response? Of course Divisions were called. If the Government wanted to avoid—

Fiona Mactaggart: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclean: In a moment. I shall comment on the hon. Lady's speech soon.

If the Government want to avoid what they consider to be unnecessary Divisions, they should have the courtesy to answer questions that are asked of Ministers. The Government can control all the motions and all the business before the House. Ministers' refusal on Monday night to answer some simple questions was directly responsible for five or six Opposition Members forcing Divisions.

Fiona Mactaggart: The right hon. Gentleman asks what else a Member can do. That seems to be the nub of the problem. We need to establish procedures whereby Members can make their views known and have their questions answered through a sensible, reflective procedure, rather than by dancing round and round in circles at 2 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Maclean: We have those procedures. We asked the Minister for Transport some questions. She had a Parliamentary Private Secretary behind her who could have run to the Box to obtain the answers. As usual, she had her big red folder. I suspect that all the answers were in there to begin with, but she decided not to respond. Whether that was out of arrogance and contempt for the House, or whether she did not like the questions and did not want to respond, we do not know.

We do not need to invent some new fancy procedure. The Minister could have read out the answers in her briefing notes if she had wished to do so. Because of that failure, as everyone knows, some unnecessary Divisions were called. The hon. Member for North Cornwall was right that that was the genesis of some of the Divisions on Monday night but, being a typical Liberal Democrat, he cas[illegible]e Government for causing the problem and then ca[illegible]d some Opposition Members for voting. It was an absurd charade, he said. Fortunately, I have had the benefit of checking Hansard. He and other Liberal Democrats voted in almost every one of those Divisions—certainly between midnight and 1.30 am.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall has re-entered the Chamber. I am refreshing hon. Members' memory, mentioning that he said that some of the votes on Monday night were absurd. I notice that he participated in those votes, but I congratulate him on getting the point correct: those votes happened because of the Government's arrogance in not responding.

As a result of that, we have a guillotine motion. There is no question of delays on the Employment Relations Bill being caused by any Opposition Member. The delays on the Bill were caused by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. He deliberately delayed the Bill after 9 o'clock, when he got the message to keep talking until the Government cooked up a guillotine.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): It was not only the fact that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry spent a considerable amount of time speaking in yesterday's debate that caused the problem. It was also the fact that, because of the Government's bad drafting of the Employment Relations Bill, a huge number of Government amendments had been tabled. If there had not been so many Government amendments, there would not have been so many groups of amendments to discuss.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is right. No Labour Member can deny that.

The Leader of the House made a virtue out of making a very short speech on the guillotine motion. She said that she did not want to take time out of the rest of the debate. We know why she made a very short speech: she had nothing the say. There was no justification for the motion. She could not justify it on the basis that the Opposition were delaying the legislation yesterday. The Opposition were not; they were co-operating fully. The only person delaying it was the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The Leader of the House could not justify the guillotine motion on the basis of the behaviour of the Opposition, the Government or anyone else on the Committee that considered the Foods Standards Bill. I have served on quite a few Committees and taken a few Bills through the House; parts of some of them were opposed vigorously by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills. I cannot remember a time when a Committee was conducted in such a spirit of sensible co-operation.

We had the odd stormy moment but, in the main, there was complete co-operation. The Opposition—Conservatives and Liberal Democrats—tabled amendments. The spirit of some of them was accepted by the Government, who are coming back with improvements. On other occasions, Ministers pointed out why the amendments were helpful but not necessary, saying that, through guidance or codes of practice, the point would be addressed. Ministers know that.

That is why I feel sorry for the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Minister for Public Health. Although I am critical of this intolerant Government for their disgraceful motion, it is not those two Ministers who are responsible for it. To use the expression of the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) in her imitation of the Prime Minister, "They are the good guys." They are not demanding the introduction of what is an unnecessary guillotine.

Why did the Government not see what would happen? Why did we not start on the Food Standards Bill? It would be a bit difficult to filibuster or delay the few sensible amendments that my hon. Friends have tabled. Moreover, if we wanted to wreck or mess about with the Food Standards Bill, as the Government know, some of us are capable of tabling more than 13 amendments.

Fiona Mactaggart: The right hon. Gentleman made it clear earlier that his strategy when he is frustrated by one thing is to fuss about something completely different.

He made it clear that he did that on Monday night. That is what I described as a failure of the procedures of the House. I imagine that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House thought that he might choose this occasion to do it again.

Mr. Maclean: What a preposterous idea. I assure the hon. Lady that, had we intended to disrupt the Food Standards Bill, there would be 50 amendments in my name on all aspects of it. I have tabled no amendments to the Bill because I was largely satisfied by most of the Minister's comments in Committee. I am also satisfied with the few—it is a few in parliamentary terms—sensible amendments that have been tabled by my hon. Friends, which are adequate for debate. It is preposterous of the hon. Lady and outrageous of the Leader of the House to suggest that a Bill that we have not even started to discuss on the Floor of the House should be guillotined, especially given that there was utterly sensible co-operation from the Opposition in Committee.

Mr. Barron: Ten minutes ago, the right hon. Gentleman said that all that he wanted to do this afternoon was discuss the Food Standards Bill, the Standing Committee considering which we both sat on, until 7.30 or 8 o'clock tonight. Why, then, does he not sit down so that we can do that?

Mr. Maclean: Because I shall not be blackmailed by the Government, who want to curtail remarks on a guillotine motion by wrapping it up with the substance of the Bill. That is the evil that my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills complained about, and that is what other Labour Members have been threatening us with today. They are saying, "Don't talk on the guillotine motion. Stay gagged. Let us drive it through ruthlessly, because every minute you talk on the motion takes time out of discussion of the Bill."

I deplore the fact that time is being taken out of the debate. That is not happening because my hon. Friends and I are talking on the motion; it is happening because the Government have phrased the motion in that way. They could have phrased it to give us two or three hours on the guillotine motion and then presented a separate time limit for discussion of the Bill itself. This is, therefore, a simple blackmail motion, because we know that for every second that we take in protesting about the Government's illiberal behaviour in trying to drive through guillotines, we are taking time out of discussion of the Bill. Although the Bill is extremely important, the freedom of Members of Parliament to have a say on all aspects of legislation is even more important.

Labour Members also suggest that, because this and other Bills have been before a Special Select Committee, we need less time to debate them. They suggest that they can be guillotined and that it does not matter if we have a shorter debate on Report because Special Select Committees of experts have looked at them. That is a jolly good thing for the 17 people fortunate enough to be on the Special Select Committee, excellently chaired by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), but what about all the other Members of the House? What about those who were not even more fortunate in being on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill line by line? The only opportunity for those 635 Members to discuss the Bill is on the Floor of the House.

This motion is preventing that discussion from happening, not because I am protesting about the motion, but because the Leader of the House has drafted the motion in such a way that every word of protest against this illiberal, intemperate motion takes time out of the debate. That is why I shall vote against the motion. It is wrong because it seeks to curtail parliamentary democracy when there has not been one second wasted on the Food Standards Bill, or on the Employment Relations Bill last night.

Mr. Hoyle: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that he is taking time away from Back Benchers who want to get on with the debate. He must realise that he is filibustering.

Mr. Maclean: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is stupid or slightly deaf, but he has missed the point that I am making.

Mr. Hoyle: Sorry?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is using the standard blackmail on us. His Government have phrased this motion in such a way that it amounts to parliamentary blackmail.

Mr. Hoyle: How can the right hon. Gentleman say that I am blackmailing him when I simply asked him to get on with the debate and allow Back Benchers who were not on the Select Committee to contribute to it. That is not blackmail. The right hon. Gentleman should withdraw his disgraceful comments; he should know better.

Mr. Maclean: I have been here slightly longer than the hon. Gentleman, and I profess that, on this matter, I do know slightly better. It is parliamentary blackmail to phrase a motion in such a way that, every minute that one takes in protesting against the illiberal nature of the motion takes time out of the subject that we really want to debate.

This motion is the Government's responsibility. They should have phrased it differently, as such motions used to be phrased on most occasions in the past. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) can laugh his head off, but he is part of the parliamentary blackmail. If he really wants time for debate on this measure, he should vote against the guillotine motion.

The motion is not necessary for the Food Standards Bill and I doubt whether it is necessary for the Bill that we were dealing with last night. I shall oppose it because I shall not be blackmailed by the Government into staying silent on a guillotine motion.

I wish to exempt, once again, the Ministers responsible for the Food Standards Bill, because I do not believe that they are guilty on this occasion. Indeed, I am absolutely certain that they are not. They will have been as appalled about this motion as the rest of us. Whenever the Government table a guillotine motion that is not necessary, I shall oppose it, as I will tonight.

3.47 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The Leader of the House made it abundantly clear that the motion arises out of the events of Monday night. I do not want to dwell on that, but I shall say this: after last week's business statement, both my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) and I drew to the attention of the Leader of the House the fact that such problems would arise. We flagged up the fact that Monday's Bill would require a second Second Reading.

When the Minister for Transport was unable to explain the events that would follow on from the motion that she was proposing, Conservative Members naturally, and quite properly, wanted to investigate that fully in the debate that followed. As that debate was then curtailed arbitrarily—and improperly, in my view—it led to the subsequent Divisions that kept hon. Members up until 2 am. As a consequence, we now have the motion before us.

The motion is absurd; it is a punishment motion. The Government are saying, "You did this on Monday night; therefore we shall do this now." It is an absurd way for the Government to run the business of the House.

The hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) said, in support of the motion, that we should have programme motions on all our business and sensibly agree a timetable in which to discuss Bills. We have been through that. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) will agree that, when we sat through hour after hour of the Committee stage of the Scotland Bill, all of which had been timetabled through the usual channels, the timetable proved thoroughly inadequate because it was a straitjacket. Indeed, the Bill was effectively guillotined.

The timetable constrained debate of matters that arose quite naturally out of the investigations and probing amendments of Back Benchers. When issues were suddenly discovered that required fuller and more expansive debate, the timetable simply could not accommodate that. Timetables drawn up in advance cannot take account of what may be discovered by proper scrutiny.

I am against guillotines in principle, but I am against this one in practice. As the Leader of the House has made clear, it does not arise from any fear about the passage of the two Bills involved; it arises from the right hon. Lady's desire to be seen to be taking firm action following what happened on Monday night.

3.50 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I expected that my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) would have much more to say. Given that he does not, I certainly do.

I agree with those of my hon. Friends who, like me, were present throughout Monday's proceedings, that we have been traduced by the way in which Ministers have described our behaviour this afternoon. We have heard from other Labour Members that we are hooligans and vigilantes. Various other phrases have been used, but they have not discouraged the Leader of the House from saying that we employed legitimate tactics. We are not surprised that the right hon. Lady considers it all right for Back Benchers to be hooligans and vigilantes, because last night we saw a Minister being a hooligan, delaying the very legislation that is now to be subject to the timetable motion. It is the Government's Front-Bench hooligans who pose the real problem.

That Minister is not the only one, however. This whole difficulty arose from an attempt on Monday to assuage the pride and the prejudice of the Deputy Prime Minister. His pride demanded that there should be a Railways Bill from his Department—a Bill which, as is becoming clearer by the day, simply cannot proceed in the current Session. That is what provoked all that happened on Monday night. A Minister was not prepared to admit to us how the Bill would proceed and would not reply to the points that I was making. I gave way to one of her ministerial colleagues in the belief that we would be enlightened about how the Government would deal with the innovative structure for Bills; instead, we were faced with a closure motion, as a result of which we spent three and a half hours on procedure. We shall spend more than three hours on procedure this afternoon and we shall spend more than three hours on it on Monday. If we take into account the time spent on points of order concerning these issues over the past few days, that amounts to a total of 10 hours of debate on procedural matters.

People outside this place will ask what has resulted from our spending nearly three times as much of our precious remaining time on procedure as will be spent on consideration of the important Bills that we shall discuss this afternoon and on Monday. The solution is simple: the timetable motions should be withdrawn. The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) helpfully reminded us today that he had signed a timetable motion a year ago but, having heard the arguments presented in the House, had decided to oppose it. It is entirely within the rules of the House for a Minister to say, "Having received reassurances from Conservative Back Benchers, and having understood why their actions on Monday night were entirely justified, we are prepared to drop the timetable motions for today and Monday, and proceed with a clear, well-intentioned, well-timed but untimetabled debate on these two key Bills."

The Parliamentary Secretary's eyes light up at the prospect. If he is tempted down that road, he will have struck a blow for democracy, for the freedoms of the House and for the mutual respect in which we hold our arguments. I am afraid that that mutual respect was sadly lacking in the Minister's colleagues on Monday night: despite numerous offers, they spurned all attempts to make them explain how they proposed to proceed with the Bill that we were considering.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend who is making a powerful point, but did he observe that Labour Members began chuntering a moment ago when he referred to points of order? Does he agree with my recollection—I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office is listening attentively—that most of those points of order concerned the procedure for the handling of legislation? The need for them could have been readily avoided if the Government, via a statement, had made clear what the criteria were for the future handling of all Bills—if they had made it clear when Bills would and would not be referred to Select Committees, and when it would or would not be necessary for there to be two Second Readings as opposed to one. The Government may chunter, from a sedentary position, about points of order, but they know that the way to avoid such problems in the future lies in their hands.

Mr. St. Aubyn: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. A week ago, during business questions, I heard the Leader of the House being told for the first time that she would have to explain how this week's Bills would be dealt with. I was present throughout business questions and I know that the right hon. Lady had no answer.

On Monday, we observed that hon. Members received no reply when they constantly asked the Government how the Bill could possibly proceed. Points of order have been made to the Chair over a number of days, and no doubt many hours have been spent in the Speaker's Office in an attempt to resolve the enigma of the Railways Bill. I expect that there will be chapters about it in "Erskine May". All that was required, however, was a little thought and a clear statement from Ministers.

The hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) asked why we could not have a mechanism allowing Back Benchers to receive answers from Ministers. We would love to know her ideas but, in fact, we have such a mechanism: the mechanism which we employed on Monday night.

Ministers, their Whips and the usual channels all knew exactly what was happening on Monday night. They knew exactly what would happen if they refused to give any answers; they knew exactly what would happen if the closure was moved and they forced us to use such tactics. There was no mystery about it. It has happened time and again. Labour Members who are now trying to present themselves as innocents employed exactly the same tactics when they were in opposition. The mechanism is there, and it was used. This afternoon, in a reflex reaction, Labour control freaks are trying to punish Back Benchers who used the mechanism which, because she was not present, the hon. Member for Slough did not witness on Monday night.

Fiona Mactaggart: My point is that the mechanism used on Monday night, if understood by hon. Members, was certainly not understood by our constituents. It did not constitute a reasonable, proportionate way of dealing with the problem that may have existed. Would it not be better for us to use our imagination to find a more sensible, transparent way of dealing with the problems, rather than simply saying, "We have always done it that way"?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I heard the speech the first time. The hon. Lady clearly was not here on Monday night—her votes are not recorded—and she may not even have read the report of the debate. The response on Monday night was entirely proportionate to the events that preceded it. We had an "unlimited time" motion, which the Chair described as a free-standing motion outside Standing Orders. If the hon. Lady likes innovation, she should have been here on Monday night because Ministers were innovating on the hoof. What became increasingly clear was that they either did not know or, much more likely, were not prepared to admit—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman is dwelling over-long on the proceedings that took place on Monday night, and is becoming a little repetitive. I ask him to address his remarks to the motion.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am trying to explain that the behaviour of hon. Members on Monday night was entirely reasonable. If hon. Members are behaving reasonably, closure and timetable motions are unnecessary.

The entire history of guillotine motions in this Chamber is based on the unreasonable behaviour of hon. Members in the previous century, when Irish Members used quite unreasonable methods to delay progress on Bills. Historically, the House has always justified passing timetable motions on the basis of dealing with unreasonable behaviour. Today, Opposition Members have demonstrated quite conclusively that, in this instance, there has been no unreasonable behaviour—except for Ministers' totally unreasonable behaviour, on Monday, yesterday and today. That is why all hon. Members who respect the House's rights and privileges must oppose the motion.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I do not recall speaking in any previous debate on a guillotine motion. I am speaking in this one because a Bill in which I have an interest has, this week, become the innocent victim of wranglings in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) has just described those events, on Monday and again last night.

On Monday, the Government did not lose their business—they obtained a Second Reading of their Railways Bill, which was the House's business on that day. Subsequently, there was a wrangle over procedure, but I should be very surprised if any right. hon. or hon. Member could have any objection at all to the way in which Back Benchers expressed their concern and anger about the Government's proposals on further consideration of that Bill.

As we all recognise, the Government were proposing a slightly unusual way of proceeding on the Railways Bill. Indeed, given that the Bill had already been considered by the Committee to which it has now been referred yet again, to many of us, the Government's proposals seemed to be very strange—thereby giving rise to legitimate questions whether Back Benchers would be able to table amendments in Select Committee as they should have been able to do had the Bill been referred, in the normal way, to a Standing Committee.

I, too, was in the House last night when more of the House's time was wasted. Last night, I clearly heard the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), who has intervened also in this debate, calling for a vote on the motion. Last night, it also seemed—at least to Opposition Members—that there was complete confusion among Labour Members. Many of us were perplexed about why some Labour Members were calling for a yes vote, whereas others were calling for a no vote.

Last night, there was such confusion among Labour Members that one of my right hon. Friends said, "Lindsay, what are you doing? You've got it wrong." However, the hon. Member for Chorley did not hear my right hon. Friend, because he knew perfectly well what he was doing: acting, under instructions from the Labour Whips, to force a Division, absorbing yet more time allocated to debate on the Employment Relations Bill.

It was sheer effrontery for the Leader of the House to tell the House, as she did a few moments ago, that we shall now have a guillotine because, last night, "it was not possible" to make progress on the Employment Relations Bill. That is simply not true. Last night, had there been discipline among Labour Members, we should have had additional time, before 10 o'clock, to debate the Bill.

Moreover, last night, the 10 o'clock motion was not moved. Therefore, it was a matter not of insufficient time to debate the Bill but of the Government denying us the opportunity to do so. Today, the Government are proposing a guillotine motion on not one Bill but two. I do not know whether such a motion is unprecedented but, in my time as an hon. Member, I certainly do not recall ever seeing one before.

Last night, had the 10 o'clock motion been moved and debate been allowed to continue, if the debate had got out of hand and the Government thought that there was a filibuster, it would have been quite open to Ministers to move a closure motion at any time after 10 o'clock to close down the business. Yesterday, if they had allowed the debate to continue after 10 o'clock but had to move closure, today it would have been perfectly legitimate and reasonable for them to ask for a guillotine.

As I said, I am speaking to the motion because the Food Standards Bill, in which I have an interest, has been the casualty of the Government's ineptitude. Ministers know that the row started on Monday because they were not able to answer Back Benchers' questions on the future of the Railways Bill. In the circumstances, the Government—knowing what they wanted to do—without fear or favour should have known what the next step would be and how to answer the questions quite legitimately asked by Opposition Members.

As many of my right. hon. and hon. Friends have said, the Food Standards Bill itself commands widespread support. There has been no attempt to obstruct the Bill, which easily obtained a Second Reading. In the House, as in Committee, the Opposition have co-operated in every way in the Bill's passage.

I hope that the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) is not leaving the Chamber now as I should like to say one or two words about what she had to say. She clearly is leaving the Chamber, but I hope that she will appreciate that I have tried to observe the normal courtesies of the House by warning her that I shall be mentioning her name.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gill: Yes, but I have much to say.

Mrs. Winterton: I shall be very brief and am very grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He mentioned courtesies of the House. I wonder whether other hon. Members noted that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies)—whose speech was very sadly described as "sour" by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who is considered to be one of the most courteous Members, with tremendous integrity and a consistent record in speaking for his constituents—clearly is very discourteous and does not understand the courtesies of the House, such as that of remaining in the Chamber until the next speech has been completed. Does my hon. Friend join me in deploring such behaviour and in wishing to see the old-fashioned courtesies continue? Perhaps Ministers could also make that point to the hon. Member for Croydon, Central when, eventually, he returns to the Chamber.

Mr. Gill: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's comments. I was not in the Chamber when that happened, but perhaps the hon. Member for Croydon, Central, who is a relatively new Member—I believe that he was elected at the last general election—left the Chamber unaware of those courtesies of the House. Perhaps he does not understand them.

I should add, having been prompted by my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), that today it was unfortunate that the hon. Member for Chorley left the Chamber after making a very direct, but not necessarily very courteous intervention on an Opposition Member. As he is implicated—because of his actions yesterday, which I have described—in the matters that we are now debating, one would have thought that he should remain in the Chamber to hear more of this debate, rather than leaving shortly after making an intervention. I am very glad that he is back in the Chamber now.

As I was saying, the Opposition have in no way tried to obstruct the Food Standards Bill, which commands widespread support. Nevertheless, the Bill raises issues of great importance which I, for one, had hoped to be able to address on Report or Third Reading. However, as I said, the Bill is the unwitting victim of earlier events in the House. There is no evidence that the Bill would have been obstructed on Report or at Third Reading. I would go so far as to say that I had a genuine fear that it would not go the distance, and that there would be insufficient Members in the Chamber to sustain the debate until 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): I have been doing a calculation while my hon. Friend has been speaking—although I was listening to every word that he said. Some 35 amendments have been selected by Madam Speaker for debate. If we had the full six hours to go through them, we would be allowed 10 minutes of debate per amendment. Does my hon. Friend agree that 10 minutes per amendment is a gross insult not only to Parliament but to the people whom we serve?

Mr. Gill: I very much regret that the Bill will not have a greater amount of time. My hon. Friend is right to point out how little time is left for each group of amendments. He will recognise that some of the amendments are more important than others and that some will demand more time than others. Nevertheless, he is right to say that the average time allowed is insufficient.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office (Mr. Paddy Tipping): The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. A few moments ago, he made it quite clear that he thought that there might be insufficient Members present for the Bill to run its full time. Now he is agreeing with the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) that there is not enough time to debate the amendments. He needs to be clear on what he is saying to the House.

Mr. Gill: I am saying that I very much regret the way in which a Bill in which I, as a Back Bencher, have an interest, and in the debate on which I wished to participate this evening, is being dealt with. I am debating this issue because of something outwith my control. If the Government had got a grip on their business and had been able to answer the questions that arose on Monday, we would not find ourselves in our present bind, which has been compounded by what happened last night.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I am trying to work out whether the hon. Gentleman approves or disapproves of the suggestion by the Modernisation Committee that there are three ways of dealing with a Bill, any one of which can be open to the House. That is relevant to the discussion. We do not want to go back over Monday's discussion, but the House was following the procedures set down by the Modernisation Committee, and voted. Some of us might not think it particularly sensible, and some might be totally opposed to guillotines—whichever Government move them—and even more opposed to the moving of double guillotines. Nevertheless, it would be interesting to know which of these approaches the hon. Gentleman supports.

Mr. Gill: Like the hon. Lady, I am not a great lover of guillotines although I understand that, from time to time, Governments will seek to impose them. I believe that that should be done sparingly. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said powerfully that we are talking about the denial of opportunity for Back Benchers to contribute to debates.

I am concerned that, because the Railways Bill has been referred to the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee, the opportunity for Back Benchers to contribute are severely restricted. How do Back Benchers make their views on the Bill known to the Committee? Are Back Benchers allowed to table amendments? Is the Committee allowed to consider them?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is again going over the Railways Bill and the debate on Monday evening. I would be grateful if he came back to the motion.

Mr. Gill: I will follow your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you will appreciate that I was responding to an intervention by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Before my hon. Friend took the intervention from the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), he said that the Government had lost control of their business on Monday. What I find so bizarre is that the Government did not lose control of their business on Monday—they got their business on Monday and have continued to do so this week. Yet, in her extraordinary statement at 10 o'clock last night, the Leader of the House said that we would have this guillotine motion due to the lack of progress on Government business.

Mr. Gill: My hon. Friend misunderstands me. I did not say that the Government had lost their business—I made the point that the Government did get their business on Monday. I have explained to the House that it was spurious of the Leader of the House to say that a guillotine was to be imposed because the Government could not get their business, and I went on to explain that she said that it was not possible to make progress last night. I have demolished that argument as well. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) will forgive me for being hard on him, but he could not have been listening carefully to what I said.

Mr. Maclean: If my memory serves me correctly—others can check Hansard—the only business lost on Monday night was when Labour Members objected to a motion moved by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on behalf of the whole House.

Mr. Gill: That event will have been recorded in the journals of the House, but I take my right hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gill: Not again.

At this stage, I should remind the House that I am not a professional politician who comes to this place simply to talk for the sake of talking. I come to the House to speak when I feel strongly about something and when I have something to say on a subject that I know and understand. I am acting very much out of character this evening by speaking in this debate, but I want to make it clear why I feel constrained to do so. A Bill in which I am interested is being sabotaged because of the Government's ineptitude on Monday, their failure to answer the questions that they were asked and their failure last night to get a grip on Labour Back Benchers, who forced divisions that we need not have had.

I refer now to the comments of the hon. Member for Slough. The House will applaud the way in which she made her suggestions about how the House might operate better. In all sincerity, I say to her that we have all been there. We have all felt frustration about the way in which the House conducts its business, and we have all felt that the House sometimes denies us the opportunity to say what we want or to get our own way. I wish to outline to her, from my experience, how the procedures of the House have been changed by Back Benchers speaking in this House consistently on certain subjects. This has led to amendments to the routine of the House, which have gone a long way towards improving the situation in the way that the hon. Lady would like.

[Mr. Gill]

Select Committees were introduced by a Conservative Government in 1979. The consensus of opinion would be that these have been a success. The fact that we can now refer legislation to Select Committees and to other—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is wandering away from the motion again.

Mr. Gill: I take note of your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Fiona Mactaggart rose—

Mr. Gill: Before I give way to the hon. Lady, she should note that if she wants to say something more on the theme that occupied her earlier—a theme that interests me and to which I would like to respond—either she or I will be ruled out of order.

Fiona Mactaggart: The hon. Gentleman referred to the establishment of Select Committees in 1979. As I recall, it was Richard Crossman who first had the idea some years before, and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is completely irrelevant to the motion, and the hon. Lady knows it.

Mr. Gill: Being a law-abiding citizen, I shall follow your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and conclude my remarks.

This is probably the first time that I have ever spoken in a guillotine debate. I have no ambition to speak in another. I hope that the Minister and the House understand why I felt constrained to be on my feet for however many minutes it has been, on this rather singular occasion.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has entertained us greatly.

I could not help feeling that the Leader of the House did not have her heart in it when she moved the motion. She has not come back for most of the debate. I do not criticise her for that; she is exceptionally busy and I cast no aspersions, but her heart is elsewhere. The becoming hat that she wore yesterday at the garden party, which some of us had the privilege of glimpsing, suits her far, far better than the Madame Defarge creation that she sported briefly this afternoon.

It is interesting that my old friend, the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, is to respond to the debate, as it was he who said:

"The Leader of the House knows that the full three hours will be taken on a guillotine motion . . . We are at fault if we do not fill all three hours"—[Official Report, 1 February 1994; Vol. 236, c. 807-8.]

He once occupied the position that I now occupy and made scintillating speeches, castigating the then Government for introducing guillotines. Unlike some of my distinguished right hon. and hon. Friends, I do not carry the baggage of Government, and there were occasions when he took me with him, both in the argument and into the Lobby.

I remember an occasion when a guillotine was introduced on a health Bill and I was so appalled that the House was not being given a proper opportunity to discuss it that I made my contribution to the debate and left. Labour Members should remember that they support a Government with an enormous majority. They are playing into the hands of a potentially tyrannical Executive if they too easily support guillotine motions. Incidentally, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) charmingly called them "guee-otine" motions. I hope that she enjoys her holiday in Paree.

Of the two underlying reasons for the debate, one has not yet been mentioned, and that is the way in which we have changed the business of the House and fundamentally altered our Thursdays. I did not approve of the experiment, driven by the Government's proposals, of having Thursday morning sittings and trying to end everything by 7 o'clock. Without that change, we would not be under the current time constraints. Today's debate proves that ending at 7 o'clock on a Thursday, for all our good intentions, is not always possible.

The more immediate reason for this debate is the character of our proceedings—the charade—on Monday night. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and my hon. Friends the Members for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne)—a distinguished theologian, as I gathered as I thumbed through Dod this afternoon—and for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) all underlined the fact that, had it not been for the way in which the Government handled Monday's business, there would have been no unduly late sitting that night.

Those of us who have been here a very long time—I remember sitting through the night, night after night, on industrial relations legislation in the 1970s—do not consider 2 am especially late. However, our proceedings were protracted by the fact that the Government had no direct and sensible answers to perfectly permissible and sensible questions. That point was also made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who talked eloquently about the reputation of the House, about last night's filibuster by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and about that farce of a vote in which there were two tellers, but no voters, for the Noes.

The Government must bear the responsibility for what is happening today. They have behaved extremely badly. We all know that July is a bad month. T. S. Eliot said that but, for parliamentarians, it is certainly July. I hope that, when we have a structured parliamentary year, the House will rise a little earlier than it will this year.

We are in this quandary today because the Government behaved both arrogantly and incompetently on Monday. Arrogance and incompetence provoke Oppositions. We were told that often enough—in as many words, sometimes—by the Minister, who is now gazing at the ceiling.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I was checking how long the hon. Gentleman had been speaking.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I frequently used to check how long the hon. Gentleman spoke, and he had several marathon records. If he wants to hold a competition, perhaps we can do it for charity one day.

Farce is added to today's proceedings by the fact that there has been no filibustering by either the official Opposition or the Liberal Democrats on either Bill. There have been no fancy points of order or ridiculously involved and complicated speeches on trivial subjects. My hon. Friends the Members for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) and for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) both spoke knowledgably, and we had further testimony on the Food Standards Bill from my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border and my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow.

Ministers have behaved well over the Food Standards Bill and there has been an unusual—for this Government—willingness to listen to constructive points. An important amendment was accepted and everything proceeded in an orderly and sensible manner. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border complimented both the Ministers concerned, and I am entirely happy to echo that. Then, last night, in a fit of midsummer pique—it can be described in no other way—at a few moments' notice, a timetable motion was imposed. The Food Standards Bill was not in jeopardy. Nobody was going to seek to talk it out—not that we could anyhow when the Government have such a massive majority. The Bill was receiving mature and proper consideration, and that was what we wished to continue to give it.

It is not for Labour Members to criticise us for taking time on the guillotine motion. In an extremely important, impressive speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who is a considerable parliamentarian, talked with great eloquence, and the House listened with great respect as it always does to him, about the background to this manoeuvre. He pointed out, as he is particularly well equipped to do, how Government after Government promise less, not more, legislation. Then, we have repeated breaking of that pledge. This Government are more guilty than any other Government of recent years, as they have driven to get their legislation through. As a result, they treat the House with scant regard and, indeed, sometimes even with contempt. In that splendid speech, my hon. Friend said that what was at issue was freedom of speech, and he was right to make that telling point.

We had just two contributions from the Labour Benches. The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) made a brief and, frankly, disgraceful little speech. He then waltzed out of the Chamber and has not been seen since. His attitude was: what a tiresome thing is an Opposition. I say to him in his absence—I hope that he will at least take time to read Hansard—that if, as is most unlikely, he retains his seat or gets another one at some stage, there will come a time when he will sit in opposition. What will he then say about an Opposition being tiresome? Many hon. Gentlemen who are present know full well that what I say is true.

Mr. Barron indicated assent.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The hon. Gentleman nods his head. He should take his hon. Friend to the bar one day and tell him what opposition is all about. The hon. Member for Croydon, Central made a petulant, vindictive speech that was riddled with bitterness.

Mr. Tipping: My hon. Friend took three minutes.

Sir Patrick Cormack: In three minutes, the hon. Gentleman poured out more bile than the Minster, who is exceptionally good natured, could pour out in three hours.

As for the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), I do not accuse her of any discourtesy for leaving the Chamber because, as she left, she looked across and said, "I'm starving." She had sat throughout the debate and I hope that she is now enjoying a well-earned snack, so will not mind what I say about her. She talked about the need for consensus, and many of us would agree with much of what she said. However, as a supporter of the Government, she should not lecture this side of the House on consensus.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), shadow Leader of the House, has signed two or three programme motions where we have agreed with the allocation of time. There was no attempt properly to seek consensus on the time to be allocated to the Bills that we shall discuss later this afternoon and on Monday. The Government must learn to behave in a parliamentary way. [Interruption.] That was a jolly quick snack and we are delighted to see the hon. Lady back. I hope that she enjoyed it.

It is interesting to see that one Member who has sat throughout the debate and has obviously taken pleasure in it is the hon. and genial Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). If he wants to learn a little about how frustrating opposition can sometimes be and how important it is for an Opposition to speak out against what they consider to be draconian actions, all he need do is walk to the other end of the Corridor and see his recently ennobled father. How glad I am to see that he describes himself on his writing paper as "the Honourable".

Mr. Hoyle: I am amazed to hear that about my writing paper. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I certainly would not use that title. Will he please check the writing paper, because it certainly is not mine?

Sir Patrick Cormack: If I am wrong in that, of course I apologise. I would hate to make an accusation that proved to be wrong. Certainly, the hon. Gentleman is so described in official literature that I have seen and I am delighted that he is, because nobody deserved the ermine more richly than his honourable dad.

We now have a Government who regard Parliament as their creature. That is a dangerous attitude for any Government to adopt. The Government treat Parliament with a degree of derision that is bad for the body politic. They react with the indignation of the short-tempered owner trying to house-train a puppy when he thinks that his will is being thwarted. It is right that the Government's will should be thwarted. It is right that, this afternoon, we should seek to thwart their will and it is extremely wrong that the Government should have brought this motion to the House in the way that they did. I hope that we shall not have any more guillotine motions in this Parliament, but I suspect that we will, beyond the one—

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): There is one on Monday.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I know that there is already one on the Order Paper for Monday.

If we do have further guillotine motions, I hope that the Government will never again behave with this ill-tempered petulance, which has been provoked by their own arrogance and incompetence in dealing properly with a Bill, and has put the House of Commons into a legislative straitjacket. This is a sorry day for Parliament. It is a sorry note on which to come to the end of a long and fairly gruelling parliamentary Session. I have no hesitation in urging all my right hon. and hon. Friends, and anybody in the Chamber who cares about the House and the democratic process, to vote emphatically against the Government.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): This has not been an interesting debate. First, I apologise to the House on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for her unavoidable absence during the latter part of the debate and the winding-up speeches.

I may be wrong but, as I look at the Conservative Benches, I see only two faces who have that incredible beauty of experience of having sat on both sides of the House before this Government took office—the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) and, I think, the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith). [Interruption.] I may be wrong, but the point is that the vast majority of them have, until now, spent all their life in this House on the Government Benches. I accept, therefore, that opposition is a new experience for them.

The procedures of the House have changed over the years since I came in. I fully accept that I have made speeches that can be thrown back at me—the longer we are here, the more likely that is to happen. I should like to say, however, that I have learned from those experiences. I know how to play parliamentary games, but I also know how to get a result. I like to make progress and to make changes to bring this place, at least remotely, into the latter part of the 20th century by introducing quality legislation. On any assessment that might be done, if this place were in the private sector, of our performance in terms of the quality of legislation, it is abysmal. We have attempted from day one to produce quality legislation on the Food Standards Agency. That does not necessarily mean that we used the old methods. In fact, by definition, we have had to use different methods.

The proposal to establish an agency started life when the Labour party was in opposition. Professor Philip James was commissioned to have a look at the idea of a food standards agency and see how it would work and what its functions and powers might be. We received the report a week after the general election, published it and then consulted on it. We received some 600-odd submissions.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No I will not give way for the moment. We then produced a White Paper "The Food Standards Agency: a Force for Change" in January 1998, on which we received about 1,100 submissions as a result of a systematic consultation.

The Select Committee on Agriculture conducted an inquiry in 1998 into the general issues surrounding food safety, and published a report. We fully intended to produce a draft Bill last summer or autumn but, for reasons that have been explained in the past few months, it was not possible. Even in the Queen's Speech debate, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear that it was our intention to produce a draft Bill and, if possible, to legislate this Session. That depended to some extent on matters in the other place.

We produced a draft Bill with notes on clauses in January this year, on which we again consulted systematically, not just as a paper exercise but by taking almost a roadshow to the regions. I went to five separate regional meetings and listened to, rather than spoke to, 1,500 or so people. We consulted on what was in the draft Bill and the consultation paper in respect of the levy.

At the same time, we set up the Special Select Committee. As we still intended, if possible, to legislate this Session—everyone can see the kind of timetable that we were working to—we asked the Special Select Committee to do a quick job. The general consensus among those who have read the report is that it did an excellent job in the short time available. It rightly made it clear that it would have liked more time. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health spent two sessions in front of the Special Select Committee at the beginning and the end of its proceedings, for a total of five hours. As we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who chaired it, the Committee took submissions from 24 outside bodies and three individuals and produced a report that resulted in about a dozen substantial changes to the draft Bill.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) criticised the Government for changing the draft Bill before it became the main Bill that came to the House. I cannot imagine anything more ludicrous. We have listened throughout and consulted at each stage. We made substantial changes to the proposals from Philip James's report to the White Paper, from the White Paper to the draft Bill, from the draft Bill to the Bill that came to the House.

Mr. Rooker: I will give way in a minute. I am going to finish the point. We did not make all the changes that the Select Committee suggested, and we have explained why. We have not made changes furtively, and we are happy to explain the changes that we have made later today in discussions on the amendments.

Every Government amendment on the amendment paper today is the result of the Government's commitments in Committee. I shall tell the House now, because there will not be time later on, that other Government amendments—technical amendments relating to devolution for Northern Ireland and Scotland—which I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have refrained from tabling today, will be tabled when the Bill reaches the other place. We knew that, if those amendments were not reached today or, for some reason, the Government decided not to move them, that would send the wrong signals—it has nothing to do with food safety—to the countries involved.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No. I want to finish the point that I am making.

We were still committed to obtaining Royal Assent this Session. The advertisements for the chair and deputy chair of the Food Standards Agency were published a couple of weeks ago, within a week of Second Reading. It has been public knowledge for a while that Second Reading of the Bill in the other place, subject to the will of this House, is programmed for Friday 30 July. To make that a reality, the Bill has to be delivered to the other place today, not tomorrow. We knew that all this week. Therefore, when we saw the possibility that that would not happen, we had to take appropriate action.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No. I am going to finish this point. I will then take questions, if we are going to have a Select Committee-type of operation.

We have to deliver the Bill today so that the other place can complete its Committee stage and any other investigation in the carry-over period so that we can deal with any Lords amendments before the end of this parliamentary Session.

Amendments have also been tabled relating to the financial provisions. It is up to the Opposition whether we have a debate on them so that they can be explained. As I promised in Committee, I have some information and some figures that I should like to give to the House about the financing of the agency. I cannot organise the business—we are in the hands of the Opposition. That being so, we had to take action to guarantee that the Bill would complete its stages today.

I am not saying that there would have been a filibuster on this Bill. It was quite possible that yesterday's business could have knocked out today's business. No one can contradict me on that. It is also clear that delivery of the commitments that were honourably entered into by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen could not be delivered. Therefore, in the interests of the package of business that the Government are asking the House to approve, and given that we have announced the dates of the recess, it is wholly reasonable to move a timetable motion on a Bill on which we have nothing to hide.

At 7.30 pm on Tuesday, I personally handed to the Opposition copies of all the Government amendments being tabled that evening. I even gave them the opportunity to table amendments to the Government amendments. We were open. We gave all those commitments in opposition. There is nothing new in the Government amendments today. It is true that we have conducted the Bill in a different way from day one. For that, I make no apology on behalf of the Government. We are determined to get quality legislation through this place so that the agency works from day one.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Minister must realise that we do not criticise his conduct of operations, or the Bill. We accept that it is, by and large, a sensible Bill, which has great cross-party support, but why, oh why, would he not accept the undertaking that he was given? I can tell him that it would have been delivered. Instead, he has ended a good ministerial story with a rather sad last chapter by imposing a guillotine.

Mr. Rooker: In replying to the debate, I have concentrated on the specifics. The whole of my contribution was devoted to answering that question. I shall give way to the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), and then I shall conclude.

Mr. Paice: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I want to make it clear that he has treated me—as the leading Opposition spokesman on the matter—and the rest of the Committee with the utmost courtesy throughout the Bill's proceedings so far; I appreciate that. I hope that its remaining stages will be dealt with in the same manner.

In that light, will the hon. Gentleman reconsider the accusation that he threw at my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman)? She and I—in my response to her intervention—were not suggesting that the Government should not have altered the Bill. We were simply making the point that, because they had altered the Bill—quite rightly in many instances—it was necessary to study the new version and give it proper scrutiny. To change the Bill does not remove that objective.

Mr. Rooker: The underlying theme of the criticism seems to be that, for some reason, if any change that the Government make to the draft after the White Paper is not subject to parliamentary debate, we are cheating somehow. We are not. We have been wholly and utterly open about the matter. To improve the Bill as it went along cannot be a charge that can be held against us. There was no criticism in Committee that we had changed it from the draft. I sincerely hope—

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: I will, but only because I like the hon. Gentleman. He has been extremely positive about the measure. Furthermore, he was a Member of this place for only six months in 1974 and was out of the place for 18 years. I shall give way to him and then I am determined to sit down, or we shall be in danger of losing the chance to discuss the amendments.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the Minister; I cannot take all these compliments from both sides of the House—they are most damaging to my reputation.

I agree with the point that the Minister made at the outset; the experience of the Bill has been uniquely constructive. It has been most helpful.

[Mr. Tyler]

However, that does not explain why this motion is before us. The Minister is right to say that there might have been a problem with the Employment Relations Bill, but that could have been dealt with separately. There is no evidence, from anything that he has told us this afternoon, that the treatment of the Food Standards Bill would be obstructed—none whatever.

Mr. Rooker: I explained that there were time constraints because of the need to send the Bill to the other place. There are 13 groups of amendments. At two hours a group, I could easily organise a two-hour debate on any group of amendments, and that would make 26 hours. That is the reason for the motion.

Orders of the Day

Food Standards Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

LABELLING OF FOOD PRODUCTS

'.—The Agency has a duty to require that all food products are accurately labelled with a complete list of ingredients, whether they are genetically-modified, the country of origin of each major ingredient and the system of production where appropriate.'.—[Mrs. Spelman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.3 pm

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 8, in clause 7, page 3, line 35, after 'matters', insert ', including the country of origin of all major ingredients,'.

Mrs. Spelman: As a relatively new Member of the House, I feel as if I have just been present at a family row, in which some family members who were drawn into the discussion were never really implicated in the first place. I want to place on the record the fact that there was never any intention on the part of members of the Standing Committee, who worked in the most constructive atmosphere with the Government on the Bill, to imply that the guillotine had anything to do with the conduct of the Committee.

I want to place on the record also a tribute to the work of the members of the Special Select Committee. It was the quality of their work that enabled our deliberations in Committee to be conducted in an extremely constructive and cordial manner.

I reiterate that I was not criticising the extent of the modification of the original draft Bill, but pointing out that, because of the extent of the modification, the Bill needed careful and considered scrutiny in the Standing Committee. I re-emphasise that that was not criticism of the modification per se.

Obviously, we are disappointed that the time for Report stage has been limited. For tactical reasons, some things are best kept to be raised on Report instead of being debated—and perhaps rejected—in Committee. The eighth group of amendments on today's selection list is just one example of something new, which has not yet been thoroughly debated, that we wanted to keep for Report. I am anxious in case, in the time available, we do not manage to reach the important subject of appeals procedure.

As we said several times in Committee, we are keen for the new Food Standards Agency to be a success. That success will be measured by the confidence that producers, retailers and, above all, consumers, have in the information and advice that emanates from it.

We have amended the original amendment that we tabled in Committee, which may have created a misapprehension that we sought to usurp local authorities' role in enforcing the present labelling rules. That was never our intent, and I hope that the new clause makes it perfectly clear that we recognise the very important role that local authorities play in enforcing labelling rules. However, our concern is about the present labelling rules. Fundamentally, the new clause would address the weakness in the present rules that govern labelling.

An important opportunity will be missed if the Food Standards Agency does not, once and for all, crack the problem of the weakness in the present arrangements for food labelling in this country. The duty of labelling, although mentioned in the explanatory notes, does not appear in the Bill. We do not intend, in this guillotined discussion of the new clause and the subject, to revisit arguments that took place in Committee. I know that hon. Members diligently read the Hansard of the proceedings of the House and of Committee.

I have tried very hard to bring some fresh points to the discussion of the very important issue of food labelling. In last night's edition of the Evening Standard, an extract was printed from Sue Dibb's book, "What the label doesn't tell you", which makes cautionary reading for the consumer. It lists a series of meaningless or misleading terms that are currently used in the labelling of food. For example, what are called "low fat sausages" may contain less fat than sausages not labelled "low fat" but are not necessarily low in fat. The terms "lean" or "extra lean", often used in relation to meats, can mean whatever one wants. They are essentially meaningless.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because I am spurred by the motive force of self-interest. As a keen consumer of beef, and specifically of minced beef, my ears pricked up when my hon. Friend referred to "lean" and "extra lean". That is a source of concern to me because I often buy "extra lean" minced beef, thinking that I am being thoroughly healthy in the process. Is my hon. Friend seeking to disabuse me of that hope?

Mrs. Spelman: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. Obviously, we sincerely hope that, in future, it will be the role and responsibility of the Food Standards Agency to define precisely what "lean" and "extra lean" mean. Some retailers supplement the information on the label by stating the percentage of fat, but there is no clearly defined standard for what is meant by "lean" or "extra lean". In case my hon. Friend should be tempted to try other cuts of meat, they, too, suffer from a similar problem, because I should tell him that the word "trimmed" has no specific definition either.

Another example is to be found on pre-packed, carton-packed fruit juices. The term "pure juice" is often used. In fact, that applies to concentrated fruit juice which has been shipped, diluted and heat treated. That is distinct from the term "juice drink", a product which contains as little as 5 per cent. juice. These terms are misleading, but not always after the consumer has tasted the product. At that stage some of the differences become much more apparent. At the time of purchase, however, things are a little unclear.

Another example of a misleading product might affect the consumption patterns of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). The term "smoked bacon" would probably lead hon. Members to envisage a traditional smoke-house for the production of rashers of bacon to be consumed at breakfast. I regret to inform the House that in many instances the smoked flavour is an added solution in the production process.

Another misleading term is "light beer". We often think of "light" in terms of a reduced calorie product. In this instance, however, it means lighter in colour, and has nothing to do with alcohol or taste.

There is misleading labelling of fruits. For example, the term "strawberry flavour" has nothing to do with strawberries. It may be a completely artificial flavouring. However, the term "strawberry flavoured"—everything is in the "ed" at the end—makes all the difference. It means that the flavouring has come from real strawberries.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): The hon. Lady is talking about misnomers, and I notice that the new clause includes the term "genetically-modified". Is that not a misnomer? We have been genetically modifying food crops for years and years. Indeed, we eat lots of foreign DNA every day. Whenever we have an apple we eat some DNA. Is there not a dreadful misnomer in the new clause?

Mrs. Spelman: I shall be talking at length about genetic modification and labelling. The Food Standards Agency could begin by providing a proper definition of genetic modification. I think that that is the hon. Gentleman's point.

I learned a thing or two from the guide to misleading labelling. New to me was the fact that bottled water that is labelled "spring water" could be tap water. Only bottles that are labelled "mineral water" strictly contain mineral water from a source as defined by the law.

I have taken some of the time of the House by reading into the record some examples of present problems with labelling. I have done so because it is my sincere wish that the FSA will get to grips with precisely these misleading terms as soon as the provisions come into force.

We might think quite lightheartedly of examples of foods and beverages that we have known and consumed, and perhaps we have learned to live with some misleading terms. However, the extent of misleading labelling may have serious consequences. I am sure that all hon. Members would join with me in extending condolences to the family of Ross Baillie. He suffered from a nut allergy and was unaware, on consuming a packet of coronation chicken sandwiches, that that product contained the very ingredient to which, regrettably, he was fatally allergic. There is a serious side to misleading labelling.

The new clause highlights the need to specify the country of origin of each major ingredient and the system of production used. As a result of food scares, consumers have become anxious about methods of production used. Present labelling is unhelpful in that respect. I shall cite the example of eggs, a product that has been at the centre of controversy in the past. The consumer can be easily confused. Upon entering a supermarket, he or she will find an array of egg boxes on the shelves, which can be labelled in a variety of different ways. For example, boxes may be labelled "farm fresh eggs". The consumer may be led to think that these eggs have been produced in a free-range style. However, farm fresh eggs can be laid by battery hens. The same is true of the term "country fresh eggs". Those also can be laid by battery hens. Barn eggs are laid by hens that are not caged, but may well still be enclosed in a barn. Only the term "free range eggs" provides an assurance that the hens have continuous access to outdoors.

How the chickens are kept matters to many consumers. They believe that that may affect the safety of the product and/or the welfare of the bird. Unless they go shopping with a glossary of the terms used to label food, consumers may easily think that they have bought a product from a production system that is entirely different from the reality.

5.15 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I have seen the term "organic eggs". Can the hon. Lady help me by defining an organic egg?

Mrs. Spelman: The term "organic" is much more precisely defined. Organic producers in agriculture have a vested interest in making sure that the term is used strictly, only in relation to organic means of production, and as the House knows, they are extremely concerned when there is any possibility that their organic methods of production may have been contaminated. Like the term "mineral water", "organic" is one of the terms used in the labelling of food products in which the consumer has learned to have more confidence. However, that confidence can be sustained only if the organic nature of the production is truly protected.

British food producers and retailers have had to pay dearly for past food crises. The Minister said in Committee that producers in this country have had to be doubly or trebly careful about their production methods in order to restore confidence in British produce. It is not difficult to understand producers' desire for the word "British" on a food product label to be associated in the consumer's mind with a premium product, in which the consumer can have more confidence than in an imported product, whose method of production may not have been as strictly controlled as in this country.

The industry may reasonably expect careful production to be a plus point attributed to British food, yet the labelling of country of origin remains elusive. Beef labelling is a case in which some progress has been made. The beef industry particularly has had to go the extra mile to restore confidence in its product. It has done so to good effect, leading to restored levels of beef consumption.

It is permissible for the country of origin of beef to be stated on the label. It remains unclear to members of the Standing Committee why that does not apply to pigmeat, sheepmeat and poultry produced in Britain. Consumers want to see the country of origin on the label of the meat that they purchase, for good reason—their confidence in the safety and public health aspects of the domestic product.

Consumers have a right to such information in order to make an informed choice. That is the essence of clause 7. Concern about the system of production has become more acute in the case of imported produce. As a result of the unfortunate British experience of food scares, we have stricter controls on our methods of production than some of the countries from which we import food.

The use of prophylactic antibiotics, which has been banned in production systems in this country, is still allowed in some countries from which we import meat. Yet the consumer has no way of knowing whether a product comes from a domestic source, where the restrictions are tighter, or has been imported.

There is growing concern that antibiotic resistance in humans may be linked to the use of prophylactic antibiotics in rearing animals. That is undoubtedly why limitations have been imposed in Britain. The consumer rightly does not wish to expose himself or herself to that risk if at all possible. But under the present labelling rules it is not possible for the consumer to determine whether a product has been imported.

The strongest argument against labelling food with the country of origin is that it would lead to protectionism. But, in truth, the consumer simply wants to know where his or her food has come from to protect public health. The failure to label food by country of origin will make the agency's role of advising the public all the more difficult in the event of a foreign food scare.

Take the recent example of products from Belgium which may have been contaminated with dioxin. Initially, the Ministry advised consumers that there had been no imports of poultry and eggs from Belgium which may have been contaminated—only to be corrected, rather embarrassingly, by the supermarkets, which said that some might have come in.

That very week I showed my nanny the problem. A pack of chicken breasts that she had purchased from the local supermarket had no clue as to their origin. There might have been a label on the shelf that made it clear that they had come from British hens, but a few days on, and to me as a secondary consumer, there was no way of knowing from where the products had come. The advice at the time from the Ministry was, "When in doubt, bin it", so bin it we did.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): I am interested to hear an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman advocate the advance of the nanny state. That is quite unusual. Given the deficiencies that the hon. Lady is pointing out in labelling legislation, will she remind us of its history?

Mrs. Spelman: The hon. Gentleman might have misunderstood my reference to my nanny. I was obviously talking about an employee of my own. Far from being an advocate of the nanny state, I am saying that the whole point of the clause is to provide information to ensure that the consumer can make a well-informed decision. It is not a question of taking a decision on behalf of the consumer, but allowing the consumer to decide. That is our strongest argument for ensuring that some misleading labelling terms are corrected.

With the vast growth in the range, quality and sophistication of food retail products, the need for labelling has become all the more imperative.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Does the hon. Lady agree that, where the product in question comes from outside the EU, within which we are assured that all the rules and regulations are enforced in an equal and even-handed way as compared with the United Kingdom, there is perhaps an even greater need for it to be labelled.

For example, as I am sure the hon. Lady knows, it is possible that the chicken that she binned came from Thailand.

Mrs. Spelman: I am coming to chicken from Thailand next. My hon. Friend reads my mind. But before we leave the EU, there is a problem in relation to labelling a product with its country of origin, even within the EU. For example, the term "made in Italy" can be misleading. That term means that Italy was the last place where the product underwent substantial change. For example, a jar of olives may be labelled "Made in Italy", but the olives could have been grown in north Africa and the finished product assembled in Italy.

A little closer to home, anticipating this morning that I might have to forgo a regular lunchtime refreshment because of the modernised hours during which the House sits on Thursdays, I sought a product that would be easy and convenient to eat. I purchased a Cornish pasty, but I was dismayed to find that all the label told me was that the product had been produced in the United Kingdom. I could not be sure that the beef in the product had not been imported and, as a consumer, I have concerns about the relative safety of imported beef.

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): The hon. Lady has introduced the magnificent Cornish pasty to the debate.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): The oggie.

Mr. George: The Cornish oggie, as my hon. Friend says. Does the hon. Lady agree that it is important that products described as Cornish or Yorkshire should be made in or derived from that place, otherwise they would not be legitimate?

Mrs. Spelman: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is absolutely essential to preserve the integrity of national and regional products.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Although I should hate to disagree with her and the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George), and although I agree entirely that there has to be food integrity, the Cornish pasty is but one example of a food that might not necessarily require a geographical description. Any piece of pastry wrapped round meat of a certain type might be described as a Cornish pasty, which is a generic rather than a geographically based food.

Mrs. Spelman: My right hon. Friend makes a helpful intervention. He spent many hours with us in Committee and referred to many examples of the way in which the integrity of traditional products should be preserved by accurate labelling.

Chicken Kiev is another classic example of a modern convenience food. Obviously, its main ingredient is chicken. Very often, the harassed housewife, who combines work and running her home, will aim to buy precisely such a convenience product at the local supermarket. The label may say, "Made in Britain", but she may be completely unaware that the chicken may have been imported from Thailand. Chicken production in Thailand is not subject to the same strict regulations as poultrymeat production in this country. Indeed, substances that are banned from use in poultrymeat production in this country are used in Thailand.

When such simple examples are given to ordinary consumers, they lose faith in the term "Made in Britain" because they cannot read the label with any confidence and reassure themselves that they are protected from a risk that they have read or heard about. They cannot be sure that reading the label on a product will enable them to take the preventive measures necessary to minimise the risks to themselves. The consumer can be easily misled in that way.

Numerous examples were referred to in Committee and one of the most notable was the fact that it is possible to import live animals to this country. The Minister is aware that French pigs are imported to Suffolk and turned into bacon labelled "British". The hon. Gentleman expressed his intention to clamp down on such misleading labelling, but that example shows that the food labelling regulations are seriously lacking.

5.30 pm

The concern about misleading labelling and the future role of the Foods Standards Agency reaches a topical and controversial point when we come to the labelling of genetically modified material in food. I understand that today's Food Commission report draws attention to the risk of labelling foods "GM free" while accepting a variable tolerance level for some genetically modified ingredients.

That will do nothing to help to inspire consumer confidence in foods that are produced with that new technology. It may be every bit as bad as the previous problem—now stamped on by the Government—of using the catch-all, throwaway disclaimer, "This product may contain genetically modified material" when, often, in practice, it did not. I am pleased that the Government have clamped down on the easy disclaimer route for the labelling of food, but they may run into another problem if the term "GM free" is loosely used.

The mere fact that there is discussion of what would be a tolerable level of genetically modified ingredients within any food product—it was reported in yesterday's edition of the Evening Standard—is a warning to the consumer already to have doubts about the phrase "GM free". The consumer cannot be sure that, in reality, the food is as it is described. The supermarket chain Sainsbury's says that it is working with a tolerance level for GM ingredients of 0.1 per cent., but, according to press reports, the European Union is preparing to allow food to be labelled "GM free" even if as much as 3 per cent. of its contents are GMO derived.

Some retailers claim they will require zero tolerance; others say that they will simply aim at that. The truth is that, if we want to eat GM-free food, it will be remarkably difficult to be sure. The British Retail Consortium has said that it will approach the matter on a de minimis basis, under which ingredients that are present in minute quantities—0.01 per cent. of the total—do not need to be acknowledged.

The Food Standards Agency is to be set up as a regulatory authority for GM food. There is an immediate and urgent task: to get to grips with the labelling of GM food. That is why we call for that to be made explicit in the Bill.

[Mrs. Spelman]

Incidentally, where does it leave the powers and influence of the Food Standards Agency when the Welsh Assembly is already addressing the issue of the genetic modification and the necessary powers to manage its own control and labelling? We discussed at length the implications of devolution for the Food Standards Agency. I have no wish to reiterate the debate in Standing Committee, but that precise example shows that our concerns about different standards arising in the United Kingdom are at risk of becoming a reality.

We welcomed the Minister's confirmation in Committee that the Food Standards Agency would have the power to act throughout the United Kingdom, without intrusive Government intervention, or its authority being weakened by the piecemeal, devolutionist thrust of the Bill. That final practical example, however, presents a good case for coming back to the question of how to resolve the problems involving the devolved relationship and the Foods Standards Agency.

I impress on the House how great the demand is for accurate food labelling to be achieved once and for all. Consumers have a right to be accurately informed about the content, origin and method of production of the food that they eat. I draw the Minister's attention to an article on the front page of last week's edition of the Farmers Guardian, which reports that its "Let's have it labelled" campaign has won massive support throughout the farming industry, with more than 5,000 signatures collected at agricultural shows throughout the country. At one show alone, the great Yorkshire show, 500 signatures were collected. They report the demand from local and county shows that imported food should be clearly labelled so that consumers at least have the option to buy British.

In calling for food labelling to be a duty of the new Food Standards Agency explicitly set out in the Bill, our paramount aim is to protect public health. To achieve that, consumers must be able to read food labels with confidence. We therefore strongly commend the new clause.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I support the spirit behind the new clause, which was moved so comprehensively and at such fascinating length. The examples used by the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) demonstrate clearly that people need nutritional value advice as well as food safety advice. I welcome the conversion of Conservative Front-Bench Members on that point.

Mr. Gill: That is not what my hon. Friend was saying. She was saying that we want information on the label so that consumers can choose. We do not want the Government or any other body to say what people should eat because of its nutritional value. That would be acting as a nanny state, and we do not agree with that.

Dr. Brand: That is not what I would suggest, either. Consumers need information that is scientifically well founded so that they can make up their minds about what to do. In that sense, I welcome the new clause.

I was slightly confused about the discussion on the use of antibiotic growth promoters, as it seemed to run counter to amendment No. 10, which we are unlikely to reach if we continue at this rate. That amendment would decouple the FSA from the Veterinary Medicines Directorate, which clearly makes no sense whatever.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): Perhaps the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) will explain that.

Dr. Brand: Yes. It would be helpful if the hon. Member for Meriden could explain that later in the debate.

We await with great interest the Minister's response to the new clause. I shall be extremely brief on all the amendments, because it is important that we have an opportunity to speak on every amendment, rather than having them rushed through at the end.

Mr. Maclean: I rise to support the new clause—[Interruption.] I appreciate the welcoming chorus from Labour Members. It is interesting that they make the effort to speak in this debate when they were remarkably silent in Committee.

The new clause has considerable merit. It is important that consumers can make an informed choice but, at times, it is important that they can make an ignorant choice, in the proper sense of the word. We make such choices all the time, but at least we have that choice. We often look at the labels on food and make decisions that may not be based on the best science or rationale.

Sometimes, our choice is based on the product's price. At other times, it is based on our perception of the product. We may sometimes feel that only a bottle of French wine will suffice, but on other occasions we may prefer Australian wine.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): English wine.

Mr. Maclean: There are some good English wines, although I have never found a good red English wine. No doubt that comment will result in more death threats next week. However, there are some quite good white English wines. I can make that choice because the country of origin is on the label.

The problem with food labelling is that the country of origin is put on the label when it suits the producer or retailer. It is included on all products where the retailer or producer thinks that it is a selling bonus. That happens in the wine business. Stilton cheese is another example—there is an added premium if the country of origin is on the label. If a producer thinks that his product will have a certain cachet because it is American or German, he adds the country of origin to the label. When the consumer does not see the country of origin on a label, he can always resort to the golden rule that the producers or manufacturers of that product are not as proud of it as they should be. There must be some good reason for the country of origin not to be specified; it is easier to persuade the consumer to purchase by making other claims on the label.

All food labels make claims of some sort. They may not make claims in the technical MAFF sense—claims, for instance, that products contain low cholesterol or low fat—but, by its very nature, labelling is intended to summarise the nature of a product for advertising purposes. It is a selling mechanism in itself.

The producers of food, even more than the producers of other materials, try to convey the key messages that they consider to be the strongest selling points.

Naturally, Governments have traditionally insisted that labelling—not necessarily labelling on the front of products, but certainly labelling on the back of such products as the Cornish pasty mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman)—should include descriptions that, at times, food manufacturers may not wish to include. I am thinking of, for instance, nutritional content, fat content, and other important information that the consumer wants.

I merely say this: why stop at the present amount of information on the label? Of course we want to know about the energy content, the fat content, the salt content and the sugar content. The labels give us the nutritional information. It is sensible to want to know whether a product is gluten free, and whether it is suitable for people with a nut allergy. We will want to know whether the product has been approved as being genuinely organic, but we can only go by some of the approved standards. If there is a symbol on the product saying that it has been approved by the Soil Association, we cannot be sure that it is "perfectly" organic—I do not think that there is any perfectly organic foodstuff in the world—but we can at least know that it has crossed a certain threshold of organic production, and has been approved by the Soil Association or some other organisation.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclean: I am happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman at any time. I rather enjoy his interventions.

Mr. Hoyle: I am very worried by what the right hon. Gentleman is saying. I think that he is discrediting all organic farmers, and that he should withdraw his comments. He is making a very irrational point, and there is a grave danger that he could put a lot of people out of business.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is becoming increasingly ridiculous as the day goes on. Obviously he is not deaf this time—

Mr. Hoyle: What?

Mr. Maclean: It must be the stupidity that is cutting in on this occasion.

It is impossible to describe any product as "perfectly" organic, just as it is impossible to describe any product as "perfectly" safe. If someone proves to me that a product is 100 per cent. organic, I shall be happy to endorse it; but does the Soil Association claim that all products featuring its logo saying that those products are organic according to its standards are 100 per cent. perfectly organically produced? Of course not. Those whose products qualify for the Soil Association logo have crossed the quality threshold, which is very high. That gives the consumer an idea of the nature of the product concerned.

We are merely suggesting an addition to existing information on labels, which many consumers find helpful, although some will find it irrelevant. Some people who want to buy a Cornish pasty will use criteria other than the nutritional information on the back of the packaging. Some will want to know the proportion of meat in relation to the proportion of pastry; some will want to know whether the pasty has actually come from Cornwall; others will not care about those things, but will want to know the country of origin. Not every consumer reads everything on the label, and makes an informed choice after taking all that information into account. If every consumer did that, the queues in supermarkets would be even longer. When the Minister studies the food surveys that MAFF has produced, he will see that consumers sometimes make irrational choices. Indeed, according to the dietary experts, they sometimes make wrong choices. Nevertheless, the choices are theirs, based on the information on the labels.

The new clause suggests the inclusion of information that most consumers will find handy and interesting: whether products are genetically modified, the country of origin, and the system of production. I think that, in regard to the system of production, the Government could be in a strong position in the future. Our production systems are one of Britain's strongest selling points, and we need to market that better on labels.

I suspect that the Minister would confirm that any survey of consumers asking, "Do you prefer buying food produced in factory or less humane systems"—however those may be described; whatever may be the current politically correct term for such systems—"or those produced in totally humane systems", consumers will certainly say, "We want products from totally humane systems—the best that there are." One could have disputes on what constitutes humanity or inhumanity in food production, or on which systems are best for food safety and animal welfare, but that is not the point of my speech.

The point is that consumers say that they are interested in purchasing products from systems that are more humanely organised. At times, however, those very same consumers may not be willing to pay the premium of such systems. Nevertheless, generally—the Minister rightly boasts about this—whether in pigmeat production, free-range chicken meat or in future battery cages, Britain leads the world in systems of animal husbandry and animal welfare. I think that the Minister would also say that Britain leads the world in checks on veterinary products and on residual veterinary contaminants in meat.

Therefore, identification as "British produced" would be a very great selling point to those concerned about animal welfare, and I hope that we shall be able to take that route. I appreciate that the Minister would have enormous difficulties in persuading his European Union partners to establish such a system and in insisting that foreign food should be so labelled. However, it is certainly within his gift to encourage British producers of quality products to adopt country of origin labelling, and I urge him to do so today.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak briefly on Report—which I, like my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), think is an extremely important part of a Bill's passage. Report and Third Reading provide many hon. Members—who, for one reason or another, have been unable to speak on a Bill on Second Reading, or to play their part in Committee—with an opportunity to comment both on a Bill's provisions and on amendments made in Committee.

I comment on behalf of my constituents, who consist not only of farmers and growers, but of consumers. To all those who might have criticised me in the past, saying that I was too much on the side of farmers, I point out that I have many more consumers than farmers in my constituency. Nevertheless, I believe that, on the whole, farmers work very hard to produce wholesome foods and other products. I also follow in the footsteps of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) in all that he said about British produce—to which I shall return later in my speech.

One of the difficulties of a shortened Report stage is that many excellent amendments on important provisions may not be debated—and I am referring specifically to the important provision of a right of appeal. I had always believed that we in the United Kingdom believed in justice and that, if a Government agency ruled on a certain matter, producers would always have a right of appeal against that ruling. Amendment No. 1 would reintroduce such a right of appeal, but we may not be able to consider it, and that is a pity.

I acknowledge that the Government went to great trouble to introduce an innovative way of ensuring that the draft Bill was scrutinised, and that the results of that process have been widely acclaimed on both sides of the House. Moreover, proceedings on the Bill in Committee were very amicable, and that is also to be welcomed. Members of the public do not always realise that, whichever party is in government, there is often much common ground between the Government and the Opposition on matters of common sense. Therefore, I commend what has gone on.

The Government are concerned about the wholesomeness of food and the health of the nation. Perhaps it is pertinent to reflect that although the agency to be set up by the Bill will ensure that food produced in the United Kingdom is produced to the highest standards, it will omit the most important part, in that it does not relate, nor could it relate, to food produced on the continent and elsewhere, because of the rules of the EU. These rules always seem to me to be ridiculous, and I cannot understand why neither the previous Government nor this one have tackled the problem with more enthusiasm and energy.

There is no doubt that for beef, pigmeat or lamb—as well as eggs—the animals have been raised to the highest welfare standards. Farmers in my constituency are proud of the way in which they raise and care for their stock, and they send their stock to market in the best possible condition. We all know that that cannot be said of many countries in the EU. It is essential, for that reason, that British products are properly labelled—by that, I mean not labelled in a misleading way. For example, "British bacon" often comes not from pigs raised in this country, but from meat imported and processed in this country. That is dishonest, to say the least. If new clause 1 were accepted, it would be a major step forward.

We are to provide more labelling of the nutritional element of food, and other information for the consumer—such as labelling of the country of origin. We must recognise also that these provisions equate with further regulations and added costs to producers, and therefore to the consumer. Many will consider the extra cost worth while, but we must recognise that we are placing added costs on our industry which will not be placed on industries in other countries from which we import food.

Food labelling is here to stay and is welcomed by many consumers. However, much can be misleading, and the information given must be accurate. My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden listed a range of foods and products which were not as they appeared to be. However, organic products in this country—when they are approved by the Soil Association—are recognised as being of high quality.

Mr. Hoyle: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Winterton: The often rather belligerent hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) agrees with me, no doubt because he has organic producers in his constituency. When I served on the Agriculture Committee, we undertook an inquiry into these matters. With others, I visited Blagdon farms, where Yeo Valley yoghurt is produced, and we were given samples. I hasten to add that I did not feel that I had to include them in the Register of Members' Interests. Since then, I have bought nothing other than Yeo Valley organic yoghurt. It is excellent, and we ought to be promoting it throughout the EU as something that is produced in a wholesome and—I believe—old-fashioned way.

I have always sought positively to buy British in everything, but especially in food, not least because I come from a farming and country background from way, way back. I have never, never bought French apples and I have no intention of doing so. When our apples and pears are not in season, I am more than happy to buy them from Commonwealth countries such as New Zealand or South Africa, but I am damned if I will buy those ghastly things that look perfect, but taste of nothing. That brings me to another subject.

Mr. Luff: New Labour?

Mrs. Winterton: No, something much more important than that. I am talking about British produce. We need to have British produce labelled as such, because it is the best marketing tool that we have. Sadly, many consumers buy on the basis of price rather than on the basis of quality. I always try to buy the best quality, and if necessary, I will buy less. It is essential to market our quality food. I hope that that message will go home and that we will be able further to promote the excellence of our produce.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I welcome the Bill. New clause 1 would require that "all food products are accurately labelled with a complete list of ingredients", but that is already done. I assume that that is the law. However, ingredients are often listed in a way that is very difficult to comprehend or even to read.

I gather from the gossip in the Chamber that if we require country of origin labelling we may run up against European Union law. I hope not. Perhaps the Minister can tell us. Will he let us know whether we cannot compel people to label food as made in this country because we will run up against Brussels?

Mr. Rooker: I did not want to intervene, because of the time constraints, but if the hon. Gentleman will sit down I will answer him. He does not seem to want me to do that.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I was making the point that labelling food as British is important as a marketing tool. We are moving towards having fewer and fewer subsidies, and we are encouraging our farmers to market quality products that should be better known by the public, such as Southdown lamb or York ham.

I am not sure whether we can implement the requirement to include the system of production on the label, but the aims of the new clause should be studied seriously.

Mr. Rooker: I shall do my best to respond to some of the issues raised, but I shall be brief and I apologise to the House for that.

On virtually every issue about which it has been said during the past hour that the agency should do something, I can honestly say that the agency will act. I can say that because it is being done now to a greater or lesser extent within the joint food safety and standards group under existing law. However, there is always room for improvement—I would not argue about that.

There are good reasons for my asking the House not to accept new clause 1. The key reason is that it would make matters worse than they are now. The Bill is drafted in general terms, and the powers of existing legislation are being transferred to the Food Standards Agency. If we started listing in the Bill specific duties such as food labelling but did not list, for example, food composition, food authenticity, food additives, food hygiene and chemical contaminants, it would be argued in a court that those issues were less important than food labelling because Parliament had listed food labelling in the Bill. Yet they are all equally important. What is more, they are all covered by the agency's powers. That can be said without any qualification whatever.

Naturally, some matters can be dealt with to a greater or lesser extent. The right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) invited me—indeed, he almost pushed me—to intervene, but when I stood up he did not sit down. To a certain extent, we are governed by European Union laws on labelling. It is not possible for us to go off on our own and invent a labelling regime. As I said recently at Question Time, there is nothing to stop British supermarkets and food producers putting the country of origin on all their food products, so long as the labelling does not mislead the public. They do not need a law or authority from this House; they can do it. We have to ask ourselves why they do not do it more often. Perhaps they are a bit ashamed of the origin. People should assume that if a product does not say it is British, it is not British. Some smaller supermarkets are going out of their way to label products as British or Welsh, particularly in respect of lamb, and others should be encouraged to do so.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: No, I must cover various points, and time is limited.

The hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) mentioned the beef labelling scheme. It is a Europe-wide scheme which is voluntary now but which will be compulsory in due course. It is governed by a quite separate set of powerful rules and the independent audit of those who use it, even down to the method of slaughter and the sex and tag number of the animal if the person chooses to sell on that basis. That is important. In due course, that kind of scheme will undoubtedly be extended to other meat areas.

I thought that the hon. Lady would not have the brass neck to mention GM foods but she did. It is worth putting on record again the fact that the Government inherited a policy not to label GM ingredients in foods. On 7 June 1997 we announced the change.

Mr. Paice: May I lay to rest the absurd criticism that the Minister keeps coming up with? The previous Government voted against introducing labelling for GM foods because, as he said, at that time there was no way of testing for them, so the law could not have been enforced. As it was not possible to test for GM ingredients, it would have been a stupid law. Yes, the technology has moved on and it is now right to do that.

Mr. Rooker: That is not the reason. The reason for the policy not to label those foods was specifically because they were not technically or nutritionally different. The previous Government's policy was to label those foods if they were technically or nutritionally different. They were following to the letter the American system of not labelling food unless it was technically or nutritionally different. Soya and maize are not technically or nutritionally different; therefore the policy was not to label them. That is why we had to pass separate rules for labelling. The previous Government approved the EC's novel food regulations so that in future any new GM food would automatically require labelling. They approved that before we came to power, so the hon. Gentleman's argument is blown out of the water. They were content for future GM foods to be labelled. That was agreed in 1996, but the regulations did not cover maize and soya—the only such foods that were being imported other than tomato paste, which was always labelled.

The hon. Member for Meriden also mentioned an issue that has been reported in the press in the past few days. I went to a public meeting just like anyone else. The people from Nestlé told the audience that they supplied Iceland under a commercial contract ingredients that included up to 1 per cent. GM ingredients for Iceland to sell as GM-free. I have disclosed that in the past, and I have been criticised by Iceland for doing so. Nestlé did not exactly boast about it, but it was part of the commercial contract. That was a matter of public knowledge. I was a member of an audience at a public meeting.

The hon. lady also mentioned the important issue of antibiotics. As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) said, under amendment No. 10, the Opposition do not want the Food Standards Agency to have anything to do with veterinary medicines. That does not square with what the hon. Lady said about antibiotics.

[Mr. Rooker]

Production methods and welfare-friendly labels are also important. The Food Standards Agency will have the power to investigate claims on labels that products are welfare friendly. If people misleadingly label something as welfare friendly and the agency checks on the files and finds that it is not, it will have the power to go on to farms to ensure that welfare-friendly methods are used. The issues raised in the new clause are covered by the Bill.

My final point relates to imports. There has been a touch of xenophobia in some of the speeches, but I understand the concern. Many years ago, before I came to the House, I wrote a piece in Birmingham. I had gone to buy a rotor arm for my old banger in the days when we had rotor arms. I picked up a product labelled as a Lucas rotor arm in a shop—it may have been Halfords, I do not know. It was vacuum packed and all that the label said was "Printed in the UK". I thought, "I'm an engineer. You don't print a rotor arm, you make it." It turned out that it was made in the Lucas factory in Brazil.

Labels can give a false impression by putting perhaps only the country where the packaging was printed or where the last part of the process was carried out. There is no doubt that they can be misleading. More work needs to be done and more pressure needs to be put on the suppliers. As I said, there is nothing to stop suppliers insisting that the country of origin is labelled on their produce. We ought to do more to encourage our constituents to demand that. Legislation is not necessarily required to make it effective.

The hon. Member for Meriden also mentioned imports. We do not always know what is going on and there will not be time to discuss all the amendments, but we are able to turn back imports or check them if there is a problem because they are labelled and we can take them out of the food chain if necessary. We recently picked up some problems with imports of beef carcases from the Republic of Ireland, which had to be labelled. Specified risk materials are found in imports. I understand that one lot was found today; so the checks are going on.

Reference was made to Belgium. We were able to check pork and poultry consignments from Belgium. They were all impounded and returned to Belgium or destroyed. An enormous amount of work is therefore being done to check these things. Labelling of country of origin or code numbers is important in that connection.

To accept the new clause would be to make it more difficult for the Food Standards Agency to deal with the issues that I have raised, where problems arise. Those issues are not written into the Bill, but the agency will deal with them. They include contamination, adulteration and food composition. It is important that we leave the agency with as much general power as possible to carry on work that is already taking place. The thrust of the demands of hon. Members who have spoken are covered in the Bill and the powers that the House is giving to the agency.

Mrs. Spelman: I have listened carefully to the Minister's reply. He clearly stated, as he did in Committee, that a clear transfer of power to the agency is taking place to enable it to take over the role of enforcing labelling rules. That is what he says the agency will be doing. However, we really did want that to be included in the Bill. We are left to fall back on the explanatory notes. I am disappointed that, after we had provided so many examples of the current inadequacy of the rules, we do not seem fully to have made the point that we did not want to transfer the power under the existing set of rules. However, given the Minister's comments, we hope that the agency will take a proactive stance in addressing some of those confusing points.

I certainly want to dispel any idea that xenophobia lay behind our desire for clear labelling of the country of origin—quite the opposite. The Minister will recall that, in Committee, we heard a good example of why the consumer might want to buy a foreign product. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) referred to the cachet of a foreign product; he gave as an example the contrast between Somerset and French Brie. As the two are largely indistinguishable, they would need to be labelled accurately with their country of origin in order to enable consumers to buy the foreign product if they wanted to do so. That is not xenophobia; it has a great deal to do with choice, but more important—in relation to what lies at the heart of the Bill—it would protect food safety.

My hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) referred to organic standards. If the Government are unwilling to accept the new clause, we want to press the Minister and—through him—the new agency to consider the problem posed by the fact that organic standards are not common throughout the European Union. The standard set by the Soil Association in this country is much higher. Indeed, that is why my hon. Friend has such confidence in the organic products that she buys. However, her point illustrates the weakness of the rules that the Food Standards Agency will inherit. We should like the agency to do something about that.

Somewhat reluctantly, we take the Minister at his word. He assures us that all the powers for the enforcement of food labelling will be transferred lock, stock and barrel. We urge him to ensure that the Food Standards Agency considers thoroughly the inadequacy of the set of rules with which it will have to work, but, based on what we have heard, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

EXERCISE OF FUNCTIONS IN WALES

'(1) This section applies if the National Assembly for Wales passes a resolution expressing the view that the functions of the Agency ought not to be exercisable in or as regards Wales.

(2) The National Assembly for Wales shall—

(a) consider the matters referred to in this Act, and

(b) within three months of a resolution of the sort referred to in subsection (1) above, make provision for the functions of the Agency provided for in this Act to be carried out in ways other than those provided for in this Act.'.—[Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 17, in clause 24, page 13, line 10, at end insert—

'(7A) If the Agency fails to comply with directions under subsection (1) in a case where the power under subsection (1) has been exercised by the National Assembly for Wales, the National Assembly for Wales may—

(a) remove from office the member of the Agency appointed by it, and

(b) remove from office any members of the advisory committee for Wales, and until new appointments are made, may itself make provision for the carrying out of the Agency's functions.'.

No. 13, in clause 33, page 17, line 43, at end insert

(c) the National Assembly for Wales passes a resolution expressing the view that the functions of the Agency ought not to be any longer exercisable in or as regards Wales.'.

No. 14, in page 18, line 5, at end insert—

'(aa) modifying this or any other Act as She considers necessary or expedient in consequence of a resolution of the National Assembly for Wales of the sort referred to in subsection (1)(c) above;'.

No. 35, in schedule 4, page 36, line 5, at end insert—

'Government of Wales Act 1998 (c. 38)—

. In Schedule 5 to the Government of Wales Act 1998 there shall be inserted—

"Food Standards Agency.

Food Standards Agency advisory committee for Wales."'.

Mr. Jones: It is a pleasure to speak to the new clause and the amendments. The spirit of these matters was discussed in the National Assembly for Wales when the Health and Social Services Committee considered whether there should be a separate agency for Wales. Clause 33 in particular makes one realise that the House is already paving the way, under the devolved provisions, for the possibility of separate agencies for Scotland and Northern Ireland, whereas no such provision is being made for Wales. That is a mistake. If Wales wants to pursue separate policies on food standards and wants the same flexibility as Scotland and Northern Ireland, it should have that opportunity.

I have considered the advice given to the Committee of the National Assembly on why a separate agency might not be appropriate for Wales. I confess that I do not find it very convincing. For example, it says that a separate agency for Wales would require separate scientific advice. I do not see why that should be so. If scientific advice is available to the agency in England, it could be provided to an agency in Wales.

For example, the Welsh Assembly received scientific advice from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee when we conducted our inquiry into beef on the bone. It was not necessary for the Welsh Assembly to have separate scientific advice. It was perfectly proper for it to accept SEAC's advice on that occasion, so I see no reason why the situation should be different with the Food Standards Agency. The Bill should allow the Welsh Assembly to have the same flexibility as Scotland and Northern Ireland in developing policies and, in the interests of consistency, we should have similar provisions.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 should be viewed in the context of our argument in support of new clause 3. I therefore move quickly to amendment No. 17. It would give the Assembly the power to remove the agency member for Wales who is appointed by the Assembly under clause 2, and any member of the advisory committee for Wales. That would be a useful addition to the powers conferred on the Welsh Assembly by this legislation. Although I hope that we will never have to call for the removal of appointees, it is important to ensure that the Welsh Assembly has that sanction.

In the interests of brevity, I shall move on to amendment No. 35. As the House will know, the schedule to the Government of Wales Act 1998 lists several bodies that the Assembly can call to give advice to it and evidence to its Sub-Committees. The Welsh Assembly has been working for only a matter of weeks, but I think that subject Committees are an excellent concept. The Committees are doing excellent work and providing good information to the people of Wales. I strongly urge the Minister to accept this amendment because I think that the Food Standards Agency should be called to give evidence to the appropriate Sub-Committee which will want to consider a range of issues in the interests of probity.

On that basis, I hope that the Government will feel minded to accept at least some of the amendments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): Hon. Members will want to debate several important amendments and new clauses later this evening. Therefore, I intend to deal with these amendments quickly, unless I am pressed.

I thank the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) for the brevity with which he explained his amendments, and I shall deal rapidly with new clause 3 and speak to amendments Nos. 17, 13 and 14. The hon. Gentleman has done what I have come to expect from a member of Plaid Cymru when we consider Bills that involve Wales as well as England: he has tried to rewrite the Government of Wales Act 1998 by giving primary legislation powers to the Welsh Assembly.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: Quite right.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point of view. Nevertheless, even if I were persuaded by his argument, I am sure that he will agree that this is not the right vehicle through which fundamentally to redraw the Government of Wales Act, which the people of Wales accepted in the 1997 referendum. I must therefore reject the amendments.

The intention behind amendment No. 35 is to give the National Assembly for Wales power to require attendance and production of documents by any person who is a member or a member of staff of the Food Standards Agency and its advisory committee for Wales. Having considered that amendment, I think it appropriate that the power of summons should apply to the agency and the advisory committee. Although the agency will be a Crown body, there are no close parallels operating in Wales. The agency will have the full range of policy responsibilities on food safety, which is a devolved area, and it is appropriate that the Assembly should be able to summon agency members, staff and the advisory committee when it deems necessary. We are, therefore, minded to accept that amendment.

The other amendments, however are not appropriate because they require primary legislation powers. The National Assembly for Wales will have important secondary legislation powers to determine regulations governing food safety in Wales. As the hon. Gentleman will know, those powers allow the Assembly to determine policy on matters such as beef on the bone, the licensing of butchers' shops, codes and practices governing how local authorities enforce food laws, infant food regulations, food additive regulations and food labelling regulations. It is not appropriate to extend those powers to primary legislation within the Bill.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset): I was a member of the Special Select Committee that considered the Bill, but I was not a member of the Standing Committee. I shall dispel a myth that has pervaded the debates on this Bill. Rather than analysing the Bill clause by clause, the Select Committee considered its general provisions. We did so in a short time, and with some confusion of evidence, because those who were presenting evidence were not sure whether they were doing so to us, as a Select Committee of the House, or to the Government.

The Select Committee considered the subject of this new clause and amendments, the consequences of devolution and the problems of a UK-wide agency that would be answerable to four different independent bodies: the Department of Health, the Scottish Parliament, the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Welsh Assembly.

There is today a supreme irony in the amendments moved on behalf of Plaid Cymru by the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) because they undermine the spirit of the devolved Welsh Assembly, which does not, as the Minister stated, have primary legislative functions. They would also take Wales out of the Food Standards Bill altogether, or, as I suspect the hon. Member for Ynys Môn desires, create a separate Welsh food standards agency.

The irony of that is demonstrated on the front page of today's Western Mail, which carries the headline, "Fury as beef on the bone ban stays", following the announcement yesterday at a press conference in Cardiff of what had been the worst-kept secret in Welsh agriculture for the past week. Meeting in private last week, the Agriculture Committee of the National Assembly for Wales voted to forgo its existing powers in an important area of food standards—the beef-on-the-bone ban. Members of that Committee had earlier said that they would vote to lift the ban, but have now changed their minds.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I am not a spokesperson for the National Assembly for Wales, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that it did not vote to forgo its powers; it simply decided not to lift the beef on the bone ban now. The purpose of devolution was to allow the devolved powers to decide for themselves. The fact that Assembly Members—in their wisdom, I believe—decided that they would not, for the time being, take a decision that was different from this body's decision does not remove the fact that they were allowed to do so, and they decided not to.

Mr. Walter: In his interpretation—that Assembly Members were not forgoing their powers but deciding not to do something—the Minister is playing with semantics.

The key point that I wanted to make is that the three Opposition parties in Wales—the Conservatives, the Liberals and Plaid Cymru—had campaigned strongly for an early and unilateral lifting of the ban. That was a pre-election pledge of all three parties. Today's Western Mail article points out that

"It emerged that those on the agriculture committee who changed their minds were largely Plaid Cymru members"— a stance which, to some extent, makes nonsense of the amendments in the name of the four Plaid Cymru Members of this House.

If the ban had been lifted, it would have made nonsense of the Government's desire, to which I believe the Minister alluded just now, for a United Kingdom Food Standards Agency with UK-wide powers and UK-wide implementation—a concept which the Opposition support.

I should like to examine for a moment the nonsense of the amendments. I shall ignore amendment No. 35, which the Minister has said he is prepared to accept, but I shall focus on new clause 3 and amendments Nos. 13 and 14, which would effectively give the Welsh Assembly the power to opt out, if it so desires, of the new food standards regime completely, or to set up its own regime, with a Welsh food standards agency.

The Minister mentioned the process that took place in the National Assembly for Wales. The Health and Social Services Committee of the Assembly considered that matter on 23 June 1999.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: I shall not pass comment on the hon. Gentleman's mischievous earlier remarks; I may refer to them in passing when I reply to the Minister's speech. However, will the hon. Gentleman read the Bill, and will he make specific comments about Wales? Clause 33(1)(a) says that the Scottish Parliament can pass

"an Act providing for any functions of the Agency to be no longer exercisable in or as regards Scotland".

What is the difference?

Mr. Walter: The difference is that the Scottish Parliament was set up with primary legislative powers but the Welsh Assembly was not. The Welsh Assembly was never envisaged as such and, in the referendum on setting up the Welsh Assembly, there was never any suggestion that the Assembly would have those powers. They are not in the Government of Wales Act 1998. The amendments would move us on a ratchet or two, by giving the Welsh Assembly those powers. That was never the intention of the House or of the people of Wales.

The Health and Social Services Committee of the Assembly was advised to support the proposal in the Bill

"that the Food Standards Agency should be a UK-wide body, advising and reporting to the Assembly in relation to Wales, and carrying out the food safety and standards functions currently discharged by Assembly staff as well as the new UK functions proposed in the Bill.

To ensure that the Welsh dimension is appropriately covered, the arrangements for the Food Standards Agency's operations in respect of Wales will include a Welsh Executive; an advisory committee for Wales; and sole appointment by the Assembly of a board member with special responsibility for Wales."

There has been general support in Wales for the principle of a UK agency. That approach was recommended by the Government on the grounds of consistency and cost. As food safety and standards are tightly constrained by the European Union legislative framework, there seems to be little scope for variation in secondary legislation.

6.30 pm

I shall refer to two items contained in the recommendations to the Health and Social Services Committee on 23 June, which are important to the new clause and the amendments. The committee was told that food safety

"is an issue of great public concern."

We would not object to that. The document continues:

"The need for consistency of policy and advice to the public is therefore a key consideration. Were there to be a separate Agency for Wales, it would need access to separate scientific advice from that which will be provided by existing committees to the Agency in England. There would therefore be a real danger of conflicting advice being made available, which would cause public confusion. In addition, since the scientific advisory committees which currently advise the Government are made up of the highest calibre independent scientists, it would be difficult to find sufficient independent scientists of high enough standing to advise a separate Welsh Agency."

That was the first part of the recommendation to the National Assembly. The separate point is that the cost "of establishing a completely separate Agency in Wales would be far greater than the Welsh share of current costs. This additional cost would have to be met from within the Assembly's current budget at the expense of other priorities. Historically the Welsh Office has relied on expertise in the Department of Health and Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in many areas. For example, the Welsh Office has no trading standards advisers. It will be far more cost-effective for the Welsh Executive to use the central services provided by the Agency's headquarters, for example for financial services and I.T. support, than to seek to duplicate these functions in a separate Agency. The Bill provides for arrangements which will make the Agency properly accountable to the Assembly; will ensure that the Agency takes account of Welsh issues in advising the Assembly on legislation and in advising the public; and will allow the Assembly to monitor the Agency's performance and propose changes to its priorities and functions."

That was the evidence that the Health and Social Services Committee considered. I have read through the committee's minutes and I will refer to a couple of items. It is stated in the minutes that "it is also important for Wales to maintain access to the best scientific advice . . . A separate Welsh Agency would lead to an unnecessary duplication of work."

That is repeated by the members of the committee.

The minutes continue:

"The costs of setting up a separate Welsh Agency were estimated"—

this was during the meeting on 23 June—

"to be approximately £6 million, whilst funding a Welsh Executive would require less than £1 million."

Therefore, ensuring that Wales maintains a strong and distinctive voice within the United Kingdom Food Standards Agency is somewhat more important than having a separate Welsh food standards agency, which would be constrained both in its scientific advice and its financial resources. The minutes record that

"the Committee accepted the proposal for a UK Food Standards Agency."

The Minister of State may recall our exchanges in the Select Committee on green top milk, which is banned in Scotland but freely available in England and Wales. We also discussed the beef-on-the-bone ban, even before the Bill was introduced. As has been said, the Welsh Assembly could have lifted that ban this week. Consumers in Chester, Hereford or Bristol could have made the short trip over the border and bought products banned in their local shops. Smuggling would have taken on new connotations in a UK context.

It is possible, even without the amendments, that the FSA could recommend lifting the beef-on-the-bone ban. That advice could be accepted by the Welsh Assembly but rejected by the Department of Health. However, the consequences of the amendments go beyond those deficiencies of the Bill. The amendments drive a coach and horses through the concept of a UK-wide Food Standards Agency. Separate arrangements for Wales would lead to confusion among consumers. A separate Welsh food standards agency would do a great disservice to the Welsh consumer and to the Welsh taxpayer.

The cost, as we know, would be at least £6 million, just to create the separate administrative structure. I would be interested in any advice that the Minister could give about the cost of a separate meat hygiene service for Wales, if that were bolted on to a Welsh food standards agency.

A more important objection to the amendments must be on the grounds of safety and science. The original arguments for creating the agency were that it would be able to call on the best scientific advice available, and would have the resources to pay for it. Separate scientific advice available to a smaller, less-well-resourced Welsh food standards agency could only be inferior.

I heard the comment of the hon. Member for Ynys Môn that a separate agency could receive the same advice but, if it came to different conclusions, the Welsh consumer might suffer. Welsh consumers deserve the same superior scientific advice as their English and Scots cousins enjoy.

The fundamental objection to the amendments is constitutional. They are a clear attempt by the Welsh nationalists to move the goalposts in respect of the powers of the Welsh Assembly. The amendments would enable the Welsh Assembly to pass primary legislation. That was never the Government's intention in the Government of Wales Act 1998, and nor was it the will of the Welsh people in the referendum. It would certainly have been opposed by Conservative Members. On those grounds alone, regardless of the scientific and the cost grounds, we have no reason to support the amendments.

Dr. Brand: It is interesting to follow the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter). I now understand the motivation of the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones). We have just heard a trainee colonial governor's announcement of what should happen in one of our dependencies. [Interruption.] It is well known that I represent an offshore dependency.

We welcome the ministerial decision on amendment No. 35. There might have been less support in Wales for the amendments moved by the hon. Member for

[Dr. Brand]

Ynys Môn if the Government had been less opaque about the functioning and reporting of concordats. I hope that we will have an assurance from the Government that the Welsh Assembly will be an active participant in the drawing up of concordats, and that Assembly Members will be able to discuss them openly and publicly.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: The speech of the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) made the case for devolution better than any argument that I have ever heard. It was paternalistic and arrogant, and the hon. Gentleman failed to understand the concept of devolution. It is little wonder that his party's vote collapsed in Wales during the recent elections to the National Assembly. On that performance, it will never rise again.

All that we seek to achieve through the amendments is to enable Wales to be treated in the same way as Scotland and Northern Ireland. I would have listened to the hon. Gentleman's remarks much more carefully if he had read the National Assembly's report on beef on the bone. He quoted selectively from the Western Mail, but he failed to tell the House that, in that same report, is a quote from the Conservative Member of the Committee, saying in terms that he accepted that the issue of lifting the beef-on-the-bone ban was not as simple as he had originally thought.

The National Assembly has decided not to abrogate its responsibility but to listen to the medical advice. When that becomes available in August, we shall reconsider the matter. The hon. Gentleman quotes extensively from some Assembly documents to support his case, but simply ignores others.

Having put on the record the correct position with regard to the National Assembly, I am sure that the Minister will be pleased to know that, on the basis that he accepts amendment No. 35 and that a quarter of a loaf is better than no loaf at all, I shall not press the three amendments that he was unable to accept, and that I also beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 6

DEVELOPMENT OF FOOD POLICY AND PROVISION OF ADVICE, ETC. TO PUBLIC AUTHORITIES

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 3, line 19, at end insert—

'(1B) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), the Agency has the function of—

(a) investigating and monitoring the effect on food safety of—

(i) animal husbandry systems and practices with inadequate standards of animal health and welfare;

(ii) the routine use of antibiotics on farm animals for growth promotion or prophylactic purposes; and

(iii) slaughterhouse systems and practices with inadequate standards of hygiene and animal welfare; and

(b) developing policies relating to any matters identified during the investigation and monitoring mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) which the Agency considers have a significant effect on food safety.'.

The amendment would include among the agency's functions a duty to examine the effects on human health of farming systems with low standards of animal health and welfare. It extends the agency's remit in three areas, each of which has implications for human health—first, the conditions in which animals raised for their meat are reared; secondly, the routine use of antibiotics for growth or the suppression of disease, and, thirdly, conditions in slaughterhouses. I shall deal with each in turn.

I make it clear at the outset that I do not wish to see the principal responsibility for the welfare of farm animals taken away from the animal welfare division of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which, by and large, does a fine job. I simply argue that the Food Standards Agency needs to be able to address all the elements that jeopardise food safety, and those clearly include poor animal welfare.

I make it clear, too, that I do not suggest that intensive animal husbandry is responsible for all or even most of the threats to food safety. Obviously, there are many other factors, including the way in which food is stored and prepared in the catering industry and at home. However, we cannot ignore the fact that the growth of industrial farming has coincided with a dramatic increase in food poisoning—by more than 450 per cent. during the past 15 years. No doubt, there are many explanations for that, but I should be surprised if that was not in some way connected with the appalling conditions in which so many farm animals are reared.

Most pigs, chickens and turkeys are intensively farmed. Broilers—chickens reared for their meat—are kept for their entire lives in huge windowless sheds, which are so overcrowded that, as the birds grow, the floor is scarcely visible. The birds are kept on litter, usually wood shavings, which is often never changed throughout their short miserable lives. Those birds often literally live in their own excrement. It is hardly surprising that bacteria flourish in such conditions.

Three years ago, the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Food concluded:

"Poultry meat continues to be a significant route for the transmission of salmonella and campylobacter into industrial, domestic and catering environments."

The committee drew attention to a 1994 survey by the Public Health Laboratory Service, which found that 41 per cent. of UK-produced frozen chickens and one third of chilled chickens were infected with salmonella. Those figures may be coming down, but they are far too high. Supermarkets find that around 10 per cent. of the 720 million chickens slaughtered each year are infected—that is, 72 million chickens infected each year.

A 1994 European Community survey found that 44 per cent. of UK-produced chickens are infected with campylobacter. I believe that those remarkably high levels stem in part from unhealthy farming and slaughter practices. My amendment would give the agency power to address that issue.

The second part of my amendment deals with the routine use of antibiotics artificially to suppress the diseases caused by intensive animal husbandry. That must also have implications for human health. For many factory farmers, antibiotics have become a substitute for hygiene and good practice and they are also used to promote growth. Quite apart from the moral issues involved, that gross misuse of drugs is bound to have implications for human health. I am not a scientist, but it seems to me that one inevitable consequence of that will be the encouragement of the growth of bacteria that are resistant not only to antibiotics used on animals, but to those used by humans. In my view, human and animal welfare are inextricably linked.

When I intervened on my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on Second Reading, he told me that the use of antibiotics as growth promoters would be within the remit of the agency. My amendment makes that explicit and goes a little further: it would enable the agency to address the misuse of antibiotics for veterinary purposes—that is, as a substitute for humane conditions.

Finally, my amendment would give the agency power to take an interest in conditions in slaughterhouses, where they are relevant to human health. Modern abattoirs are capable of slaughtering as many as 300 pigs or 8,000 chickens an hour. At that rate, even with the best will in the world—that is not always present—it will be nigh on impossible to safeguard either the welfare of animals or the hygiene of the meat. I shall leave to one side for the purpose of this debate the unspeakable cruelty to which industrial killing on such a scale gives rise and focus instead solely on the implications for human health.

The 1996 report of the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Food identified slaughterhouses as a significant contributor to the high levels of salmonella and campylobacter found in poultrymeat. The Committee said:

"Slaughter and processing operations give rise to a very wide range of practices which can have a serious effect on the spread of microbiological contamination".

My amendment would bring slaughterhouses within the remit of the agency. I appreciate that it may be argued that there are other agencies with responsibility for the regulation of factory farming and slaughterhouses. I wish them well in their work and I have no desire to diminish their powers. In the interests of joined-up government, which we are all in favour of these days, the Food Standards Agency will no doubt want to work closely with them in any case, but I do not see why slaughterhouses, where relevant, should not fall within the remit of the agency. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr. Paice: I want to put on record a few of the Opposition's thoughts on the amendment. We sympathise very much with a number of the points made by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) about the objective of ensuring that our food is humanely and hygienically reared and hygienically slaughtered and processed. However, we have some real doubts about some of those points and the way in which the amendment could operate.

First, the word "inadequate" appears twice in the amendment. I suggest that what is and is not inadequate welfare is a highly subjective matter, and that word in itself would cause major legal problems of interpretation. Secondly, I should put it on record that I think it is very unwise to suggest or imply that different systems of animal welfare automatically bring with them different hygiene and food safety issues. There will not necessarily be such a conjunction. The example of eggs was mentioned in Committee and there is evidence that eggs produced in well-managed battery cages are probably more hygienic and less likely to carry salmonella than free-range eggs. The difference is not the system of welfare and of keeping animals, but the standard of husbandry, the management and the human aspect. The point is not whether chickens, pigs or whatever are kept in a particular system, but whether they are managed effectively.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, South referred to broilers kept in their own excrement. Such an emotive statement belies the truth entirely. Yes, they are kept on wood shavings, but, as he said, they are there only for a short period and it is not necessary to replace them. Indeed, it would be physically impossible to replace them without huge welfare implications—moving the birds off the shavings so that new ones could be put in would have huge welfare implications.

To suggest that systems of welfare carry different food safety implications is to ignore the reality. Good farmers will produce safe food in any conditions. Bad farmers—we have to admit that there are some examples—will produce unsafe food whatever the conditions, including free range; the sort of conditions that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South probably espouses. It is the quality of the management that matters.

Dr. Brand: Is not the purpose of the Food Standards Agency to establish whether there is a link between animal welfare, the methods of rearing animals and producing food and food safety? We can all make assumptions from different perspectives in the animal welfare sector, but we need scientific evidence, such as that quoted by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), to ensure that we are protecting the public.

Mr. Paice: I am putting forward reasons why the Government would be ill advised to accept the amendment. We do not support it, although it is not out of lack of sympathy. If he looks at the Bill in its entirety, the hon. Gentleman will find that there is plenty of scope for the agency to examine the issues to which he refers. My point is that implicit in the amendment is the suggestion that different animal welfare systems automatically carry with them different food safety implications. I reject that contention.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) said that changes in agricultural practices since the war are responsible for increased food poisoning, but the greatest changes have taken place in methods of food storage and preparation, in the types of food available and in cooking methods—microwaves and all the other food technology—plus a changing population eating on the hoof and not cooking food in the old-fashioned way, when everything was roasted or boiled to extinction.

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend makes the point that I was going to make in my next sentence. In the past two or three decades, we have moved from the situation where the housewife—usually the person in the house, although I shall try to avoid sexism—purchases the raw materials and prepares a cooked meal. Nowadays, that is much less often the case. Therefore, a raft of changes could have brought about hygiene problems.

Mr. Mullin: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will remember that I acknowledged that point, and said that animal welfare systems were just one of the factors. I did not claim even that they were the greatest factor. I accept his argument.

Mr. Paice: I accept that.

The positive side of the amendment, which does not outweigh the negative side—which is why we cannot support it—is that it would allow the Food Standards Agency to emphasise what the Opposition contend are already high welfare standards in this country. There will always be room for improvement. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South would probably disagree about aspects of that improvement, and no one would pretend that there is not always room for some change. However, the Minister of State rightly praised our standards of welfare. This country has already taken steps to outlaw veal crates, sow stalls and tethers.

We have higher welfare standards than many of the countries from which we import food. Ministers have rightly spoken about the welfare premium. However, that is made at the retail end; it is important that it is reflected in the extra costs incurred by producers. For example, our pig producers, who produce pigs without using stalls or tethers because those are illegal here, must compete with producers of pigmeat produced in countries that use those systems.

In the previous debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) referred to the importance of ensuring that labelling included the system of production and the country of origin, so that consumers could bear those in mind in making a choice. If a housewife wants to buy foreign pigmeat, she should be able to do so in the full knowledge that it might not have been reared to the standards which we expect to be used in this country.

Mr. Gill: I happen to know that, yesterday, my hon. Friend met the chairman of Assured British Meats. Does he agree that many of the points that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) made are covered by the scheme of policing, controlling and monitoring all the processes in the production of British meat, which is partly funded from public money? Does not that answer many of the criticisms that the hon. Gentleman made?

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend, with his immense knowledge of the meat industry, is entirely right. Assured British Meat, set up and partly funded from public money, is doing a fantastic job in ensuring that our meat is produced to the highest standards, and that that is used as a marketing tool so that the public are aware of it.

We sympathise with the objective of ensuring that those matters are taken into account—I have not mentioned slaughterhouses as I am sure that the Minister will pick that point up—but we have serious doubts about the phrasing of the amendment. We shall therefore not support it, should it be pushed to a vote.

Mr. Luff: I share many of the doubts and reservations expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) about the amendment. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and I had an opportunity to discuss these issues, and I understand and respect his concerns. He may be partly right and partly wrong about this issue, but in a sense that does not matter in terms of his proposals because the Bill fully addresses all the concerns that he has expressed.

The amendment would not extend the Bill, as he suggested in his opening remarks, but would lead to overdue specification of one aspect of the concerns and issues that the agency will address. Clauses 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 deal with the agency's functions. They deal with developing policies for food safety or other consumer interests in relation to food. Clause 7 provides advice and information to the general public. Under clause 8, the agency has the function of obtaining information on those issues. Clause 9 deals with animal feeding stuffs—which, at least in part, deals with the hon. Gentleman's concern about antibiotics. Crucially, clause 10, on the powers of the agency, says:

"The Agency may, for the purpose of carrying out its function under section 8 or . . . 9, . . . with a view to obtaining information about . . . any aspect of the production or supply of food or food sources", seek information, including observations about

"agricultural premises, agricultural businesses or agricultural activities".

The Bill therefore contains a comprehensive range of provisions, which fully deal with the hon. Gentleman's concerns. Whether his concerns are legitimate or not is irrelevant. The agency has those powers.

I repeat the concern expressed by the Minister about new clause 1. He said that to accept new clause 1 would be to distort the purpose of the agency. Accepting amendment No. 11 would have the same effect: it would distort the purpose of the agency by putting undue focus on specific activities, concerns and issues in the food chain, when there are so many others that should worry us.

If the hon. Member for Sunderland, South wanted to highlight one priority, it should have been that which he just mentioned in passing. It is one that he and I discussed, and which was raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean): the priority of hygiene in the kitchen.

If I were asked which of all the concerns about food safety was the most important, I would say it was hygiene. To make the issues raised today by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South a priority would be to detract from what I consider to be the priority. It is clear that most instances of food poisoning occur after the food has left the farm, and after it has left the factory, and that it tends to occur in catering establishments more often than in the home. In saying that, I do not intend to excuse poor standards earlier in the food chain. It is crucial for our farmers to produce food to the highest possible standards, and there is no excuse for sloppy practices.

Dr. Gibson: One of the problems in kitchens now is that some utensils are coated with antibiotics. That is relevant to some of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). Antibiotic resistance is being passed on to the human population. You win some, you lose some.

Mr. Luff: I do not think that we need to debate the merits of the issue. I have a good deal of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman has said: issues do arise from antibiotic resistance. I think that most of them arise from overuse of antibiotics in human medicine rather than animal medicine, but that is not to deny that antibiotics in animal medicines and practices pose a problem. My Select Committee expressed concern—albeit perhaps a little too simply—in its report on food safety, which was published more than a year ago.

I share the doubts expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire about the definition of "inadequate". The definition itself is inadequate. Two sub-paragraphs in amendment No. 11 use that word, referring to "inadequate standards of animal health and welfare" and

"inadequate standards of hygiene and animal welfare".

I agree with my hon. Friend that "inadequate" is a very subjective term, and I think that that in itself is a good reason for us to doubt the merits of the amendment.

I am also worried about the highlighting of "slaughterhouse systems and practices". I respect the concerns that were in the mind of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South when he tabled the amendment, and I do not know the views of other Conservative Members, but I believe that, if anything, slaughterhouses are already over-regulated. Some of the most animal welfare friendly slaughterhouses in Worcestershire have been forced to close as a result of over-regulation, and I think that the Government are doing a tremendous job in monitoring the standards of the abattoirs that remain. The hygiene assessment score system is working extremely well, and I think that it deserves our support.

The requirement that the amendment imposes on slaughterhouse systems suggests the existence of a worry that the House ought not to have. The Minister of State should be congratulated on what he is doing to drive up standards, but that has already been at some cost. Some of the best slaughterhouses have already gone, and those that remain are paying a heavy price for the privilege of this system of regulation.

The amendment might have a particularly heavy impact on domestic production, and no corresponding impact on imported products. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire made that point. Many of our greatest concerns are not about British systems, which are generally the best in the world, but about foreign systems, which clearly are not. My hon. Friend rightly spoke at length about pigs. That is a classic example of our standards being the highest in the world, but I fear that the amendment could send a signal to the contrary.

I am also worried about the fact that the amendment deals only with livestock. Many food poisoning issues have nothing whatever to do with livestock; they relate to a range of other foodstuffs. I do not think that it is helpful to highlight livestock as being a particular problem.

It is understandable that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South should feel as he does about intensive farming, but disease control is often easier in intensive farming systems than in non-intensive systems. The incidence of, for example, salmonella is often a great deal higher in the case of free-range chickens and free-range eggs, and—ironically—badly managed free-range chicken production is often less welfare friendly than well-managed intensive systems. That, however, is a separate issue.

The House should reject the amendment because it is unnecessary. It adds nothing to the Bill and it gives priority to the wrong set of issues. I hope that the Minister will invite the House to reject it.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I want to follow the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) and echo his hope that the Minister, in his reply, will not look with favour on amendment No. 11.

The Minister will be aware that, earlier this year, the Agriculture Minister announced a programme of increased inspections which, if implemented, would have cost the abattoir industry an extra £20 million. However, I am glad to say that as a consequence of representations, he announced a complete deferral of specified risk material inspection costs for that financial year. Subsequently, we have learned that, in the past few years, there has been tremendous improvement—and rightly so—in the United Kingdom's abattoirs.

The risk that we run now is that, by imposing so many extra costs and regulations, we shall close down the abattoirs and cause something that I am sure that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) would not like at all: longer journeys, at great expense, for animals on the way from farms to the slaughterhouse. Although it is very much better to have those facilities close to farms, in my own area, for example, we have only two small abattoirs left.

The head of the farm animals department of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals said that the originally proposed additional costs represented a serious economic threat, and that there was no doubt that the current proposals would result in the closure of some small abattoirs. We therefore believe that the extra burdens proposed in amendment No. 11 would be counterproductive. If we are to maintain standards and have the farming communities on our side, and in the light of action already taken, we must be very careful to avoid imposing further burdens that will have a counterproductive effect.

Mr. Andrew George: In supporting the purpose of amendment No. 11, I should like also to draw attention to the significance of small businesses and low-throughput abattoirs in meeting high animal welfare standards.

If we had had sufficient time, amendment No. 11 could and should have been debated in relation to amendment No. 32—which I had hoped we would be able to debate. However, as we are now entering the third hour of a three-hour debate, but have reached only the third group of amendments, it is becoming clear that we shall not reach the ninth group, which deals with the fact that—for the reasons already given by the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith)—small businesses and low-throughput abattoirs meet very high animal welfare standards. I think that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) would accept that, because of shorter travel times and a quieter and less stressful environment inside the abattoirs themselves, low-throughput abattoirs meet high animal welfare standards.

As the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) correctly said, on any objective assessment, inspection levels at small, low-throughput abattoirs are excessively high. Just last week, for example, one small abattoir in my constituency complained that it had four inspectors watching one person work. The week before, the ratio was three inspectors to two workers. Such an inspection level, and the charges consequently imposed, is a burden on small businesses.

An important aspect of the Bill is its provision for both high animal welfare standards and protecting the interests of small businesses. As I said, I had hoped that, were it not for the antics largely of Conservative Members, we would have an opportunity to consider fully all of the amendments tabled on Report, so that we might be able to consider the very deep and serious concerns of small businesses about the Food Standards Agency's impact on them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot speak to a specific amendment and then lament the fact that he cannot go on to further amendments.

Mr. George: I appreciate that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you will understand the frustrations felt by Liberal Democrats at the lack of progress.

Having expressed that frustration, I wish to say to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South that there is a crucial link between the importance of meeting high animal welfare standards and protecting the interests of small businesses. It not just a question of low-throughput abattoirs. I hope that the Minister will take account of the impact of the Food Standards Agency on small businesses, because small producers, processors and retailers need advice and help, as well as a recognition that they do not want disproportionate charges laid upon them. Such charges could put them out of business and result in lower animal welfare standards all round and a considerable diminution in the fabric of rural life, severely damaging the economy of rural areas.

Mr. Hancock: The House is well aware of my hon. Friend's championing of the small business man, and of business generally. However, surely he is not suggesting that the Minister should look sympathetically at proposals which would in any way lower standards of animal welfare, as well as those standards that the public would require from small businesses to remain confident that they were supplying a product which was good enough for them to eat and for their families to enjoy.

Mr. George: I am grateful to my hon. Friend—I want to emphasise, as I have done before, that it is not a question of lowering standards for small, low-throughput producers: it is quite the opposite—small producers usually meet high standards of hygiene. We must take into account the effect of the operation of the agency on small businesses; otherwise it will damage the rural economy and the rural way of life, and jobs will be lost. Through that, the quality of animal welfare will be reduced.

Mr. Rooker: I welcome the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), in that it has provided us with this debate. I recall my hon. Friend's contribution at Second Reading, and he has referred to an aspect of the Bill that is in the shadows and does not have as high a profile as some other issues. Nevertheless, it is an important matter. I hope that I can assure my hon. Friend that the thrust of the issues that he has raised will be taken on board in the Bill.

The Bill extends the scope of the Food Safety Act 1990 to cover production of food sources. That means that the regulation-making powers of the 1990 Act could, if necessary—for food safety reasons—be used in relation to husbandry matters. There is no question about that. The lead role in the use of antibiotic growth-promoters in farm animals will continue to fall to the Veterinary Medicines Directorate, an agency of MAFF. However, the Food Standards Agency will have an effective veto on the regulation of veterinary medicines. A member or placeperson of the agency will be on the Veterinary Products Committee, which gives independent scientific advice to the Government. The agency will be involved closely in any matters concerned with antibiotic resistance, which is clearly a public health matter and goes beyond my Department.

I understand the issues touched on in relation to slaughterhouses. Hon. Members know that, because of the time allocation, they have used up too much time on that subject, and they cannot debate the Meat Hygiene Service.

Mr. Paice: There is still time.

Mr. Rooker: The hon. Gentleman does not know when I am going to sit down.

7.15 pm

Legitimate points have been made and I understand the frustrations. I want to make it abundantly clear that the Food Standards Agency will have direct and specific responsibility for both policy and enforcement in all abattoirs. The Meat Hygiene Service will be part of the agency and accountable to it. There will be separate arrangements for auditing, which we discussed in Committee but will not have the chance to debate today.

The hygiene and animal welfare rules for slaughterhouses are a direct responsibility of the Food Standards Agency. There is no question whatever about that. That is important because the meat industry is big business. We slaughtered 10,000 cattle today for food. We did the same yesterday and we will do the same tomorrow. There are huge factory abattoirs and small abattoirs where slaughtering may occur only one day a week.

We slaughtered 2 million broiler chickens today; we did it yesterday, and we will do it tomorrow. The hygiene conditions must be tightly controlled and I make no apology for the actions that we have taken in the past two years to drive up standards in the meat industry. I made my own modest contribution by going through a small part of the modules of the Meat Training Council. I got nowhere near slaughtering, of course, but I wanted to show that we are mustard keen on better and more training for everyone throughout the industry. I did not see why a Minister should be kept out of that if I could do something to contribute.

Mr. Gill: As president of the Meat Training Council, I want to tell the House that we are all in this together. We all want to raise standards and improve training, hygiene and efficiency in the industry. We are most grateful to the Minister for having submitted himself to the course that he underwent.

Dr. Gibson: The running dogs of the pig industry.

Mr. Rooker: No, no. Hang on. In the days when we had them, the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) was my pair, so leave him alone.

The Food Standards Agency will be able to go anywhere in the food chain—there are no no-go areas in the food production system—and it will interfere or regulate to a greater or lesser extent at different parts of that chain, hardly touching some and getting actively involved in others. If there are arguments about the quality of welfare-friendly meat and mis-labelling, it will certainly have the powers to get that sorted out.

I have been to nine abattoirs—I visited one pig abattoir with the hon. Member for Ludlow—to see matters at first hand. Welfare conditions at slaughter are crucial, not only because of our respect for animals but because meat from happy animals tastes better. A happy pig is a tasty pig. There are chemical changes in animals slaughtered in stressful conditions. That is a plain fact. We must treat such issues extremely seriously.

The amendment is not necessary. The wholly legitimate issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South are covered in the Bill, as the agency will have powers throughout the food chain and in relation to the Veterinary Medicines Directorate. The Meat Hygiene Service does not currently set its own policy—the policy is agreed between the Department of Health and my Ministry in the joint food safety and standards group—but the Food Standards Agency will take that role and will be able to deal with clean cattle policy and hygiene rules at slaughtering. So these matters are central to the Bill; they are not outwith it.

Salmonella was mentioned. In the coming weeks and months we shall be discussing performance targets for the agency—how we can check whether it is doing the job that the House intends it to do. One such measure would not be simply to reduce food poisoning because we do not know its cause. It is multifaceted, so difficult to set as a performance target. However, the eradication of salmonella and campylobacter in the flock could be looked at over a period of years because there are techniques known to do that. One factor in the assessment of the agency's success could be just that. If those bacteria can be eliminated at the beginning of the chain, there are less likely to be problems caused by people handling food incorrectly in the home or the retail and catering trades.

The agency will be actively involved in animal husbandry and welfare. I hope that I have said enough to give my hon. Friend the encouragement and comfort he needs. I thank him for raising these issues and hope that he will not press his amendment.

Mr. Mullin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the positive tone of his reply. I acknowledge the good work of his Department in raising farm animal welfare standards. Much more progress must be made to eliminate the worst excesses of factory farming, about which we have been complacent for far too long. I appreciate that we can move only at the speed at which we can convince our EC partners to move, but I recognise that the Government are doing their best in this area.

We have had a useful little debate. The Bill should not pass without some reference to the welfare of the millions of farm animals that are slaughtered every week. It is an issue of great concern to our constituents and to many of us on both sides of the House.

To take up a point made by the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), I am a little nervous when I hear people say that we have the best standards in the world. Over the years, I have heard that applied to our police force, our judges and, with rather more accuracy, to our armed forces—indeed, to a whole range of our institutions. It smacks slightly of complacency, if he will forgive my saying so, and we should never be complacent.

I acknowledge the points made by the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) about the need for local abattoirs to be properly regulated to prevent stressful lengthy journeys to slaughter. I am grateful to the Minister for his assurances and clarifications. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mrs. Spelman: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 3, line 25, at end insert—

'(4) Any authority making such a request shall immediately publish its reasons for so doing.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 12, in clause 21, page 10, line 43, at end insert—

'(4) The Agency shall make a report to Parliament on the exercise of its powers under this section in each calendar year.'.

Mrs. Spelman: It is my pleasure to speak to these amendments. I intend to be as brief as possible in the interests of reaching some of the meatier subjects, if the House will forgive the pun, further down the amendment paper in the restricted time available.

The purpose of amendment No. 2 is to add a duty to any authority which makes a request to the agency to exercise its powers. The principal reason behind it goes back to one of the core themes of many of our amendments, which is to preserve the independence and ensure the transparency of the agency.

I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who has been present throughout much of the debate and who has been a watchdog for this whole question of independence and transparency for the agency. At many points in the Standing Committee Hansard he pointed out the need to try at all costs to preserve the independence of the agency. That is why we believe that it is imperative that when a request is made for the agency to exercise its powers, the reasons should be stated immediately. In that way, consumers, producers and retailers will be able to see the open working of the agency. We feel strongly that if there is any delay in giving the reasons, or if the reasons are not given, for requesting the agency to exercise its power, its independence will be undermined.

On other clauses, we have called for the reasons for the exercise of power to be clearly stated. For example, in clause 11 the power of entry to premises comes without the agency's having to state the reasons for going in. We understood the reason for the random visiting by foods standards officers and why the reasons could not be stated in that instance, but we believe that it is imperative that the reasons are published immediately where another authority—a Minister, a Department or a devolved authority—makes a request.

We were pleased that amendment No. 12 was selected on Report because it deals with the huge powers contained in clause 21. We christened clause 21 the Martini clause. Anyone familiar with the advertising will know that the slogan for Martini was "Any time, any place, anywhere". We have some concern that the agency has been granted sweeping powers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) has wisely spotted the need to introduce some constraints and has succeeded in having the amendment selected. That gives us another chance to restrain the huge powers in clause 21. The Chartered Institute of Environmental Health has expressed to me its concern that no clear explanation of clause 21 was given in Committee. Perhaps we may hear from the Minister that some restraining powers will be imposed in connection with clause 21 that would give us some comfort.

Amendment No. 12 would require the agency to make a report to Parliament on the exercise of its powers in each calendar year as part of its annual report. If it were accepted, it would bring greater accountability to the otherwise sweeping powers contained in the clause.

Mr. Gill: Amendment No. 12, which is tabled in my name, would amend clause 21, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) has just referred as the Martini clause. The Minister of State spoke earlier about the quality of the legislation that had gone through the House. He went so far as to say that some legislation that had reached the statute book was abysmal. I am anxious that we do not put on the statute book legislation that could be described as abysmal. We are all concerned about the amount of legislation that is reaching the statute book and, as a consequence, the amount of regulation to which business in this country is subject. We all want less regulation.

We need to deal with the problem. The problem is that the Bill is another enabling Bill, despite all its good features. Whenever we put a Bill that can be described as enabling on the statute book, we open the floodgates of regulation from successive Ministers and Departments. Although the Bill is generally accepted to be good in many ways, it is yet another enabling measure, which will give future Ministers—indeed the present Minister—wide powers. Incidentally, I am sure that the House would want to pay tribute to the Minister for the way in which he has steered the Bill through the various processes that he described earlier. We give him credit for the fact that he has used new procedures to ensure that there has been the fullest consultation at every stage. That is much appreciated. However, despite all the consultation and the Minister's best offices, this is an enabling Bill, which gives the Government enormous powers to do almost whatever they want.

7.30 pm

The Minister is aware that, on Second Reading, I was critical of the fact that the Government were taking those unnecessary powers. I pointed out that it would be undesirable because the measure gives MAFF a blueprint to come back with further measures at any stage—"any time, any place", as my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden says. Those measures will not be subject to the same scrutiny as the Bill.

On Second Reading, I quoted the opening sentence of clause 21, which states:

"The Agency has power to do anything."

I criticised that. The Minister responded by saying, in effect, that it was grossly unfair of me to have quoted only the first part of that sentence. However, if I now quote the full sentence, the Minister will agree that the sense is not changed in any way. It states:

"The Agency has power to do anything which is calculated to facilitate, or is conducive or incidental to, the exercise of its functions."

For the sake of brevity on Second Reading, I did not use the whole sentence, but whether one uses only the first seven words or the whole sentence, it makes no difference. Obviously, if the agency has powers to do anything, such powers must be within its remit. I was not pretending for one moment that the Bill enabled the Government to do anything in any matter. It stands to reason that the provision applies only to the Bill. The Minister was being too sensitive in his winding-up speech on Second Reading, when he referred to my criticism of the fact that the Government had taken so much power.

At this late stage in the Bill's proceedings, it will be difficult—if not impossible—to persuade Ministers to renounce or limit the Bill's powers. However, it is not unreasonable to ask the Minister to consider my amendment, which would provide for the Government to make a report to Parliament about the powers that they exercise under clause 21. The Minister should be sympathetic to the amendment; he is a democrat, and he shares our concern about the plethora of legislation that emanates from Government. This is not a party political point; during the past decade or so, Governments of all persuasions have been equally guilty in passing enabling legislation, which has triggered the plethora of regulation to which we all object.

I hope that the Minister will consider accepting the amendment. It is supported by the Food and Drink Federation—the recognised umbrella organisation for many trade associations in the food and drink industry, although not all of them belong to it. In a circular letter, which I imagine has been sent to all Members of Parliament who are interested in the Bill, the federation says that it supports the objective of the amendment in seeking an annual report on the exercise of the agency's powers under clause 21 and believes that that should be included in the annual report that the agency is required, under clause 4, to make to Parliament.

The Minister is a reasonable man and I know that he takes great pride in the Bill. It has been his baby and he has steered it all the way through its parliamentary process. He was there at its inception and, God willing, he will be there when it reaches the statute book. Such things as reshuffles intervene, but I hope that the Minister will survive the next reshuffle in his present office where, within the constraints that the overall direction of his Government impose, he has done a very good job.

On behalf of my industry, I compliment the Minister on taking the time and the trouble to understand the industry. We do not underestimate his achievement. The Minister represents an urban constituency and it is unlikely that he knew much about agriculture, livestock and all the processes associated with them when he assumed his present role. However, the Minister has learned about them and the industry is grateful to him for doing so.

With that background of knowledge and understanding and as a result of the educational courses he has undertaken, the Minister must recognise that the Government are taking unlimited powers that they currently do not need. If such powers were necessary, presumably they would be spelt out in the Bill. However, the Government have not done that. As they are taking draconian powers for reasons that are not obvious, the Government should return to the House at some stage—once a year is suggested—to report what has been done under this particular clause.

On Second Reading, I was critical of other clauses in the Bill for exactly the same reason. It is hypocritical for politicians to sympathise with our constituents about the burden, cost and nuisance of legislation when we participate in debates on legislation such as this which will open the floodgates to even more regulation. On Second Reading, I referred to my support for the Food Safety Bill in 1990.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's remarks must be more specific and remain within the terms of his amendment. In some respects, he is making a Second Reading speech. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should remind us of the content of his amendment.

Mr. Gill: I shall come directly to the point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Members of Parliament may consider legislation such as the Food Standards Bill but we do not always examine, scrutinise and criticise it in the way that we should. That is particularly true of new Members of Parliament. I was a new Member myself once, and I have kicked myself for not being more diligent in respect of the 1990 legislation to which I referred a moment ago that led to other legislation—to much of which I and others would have objected.

That is a most important point for the House to understand. If we pass general legislation and put enabling Bills on to the statute book, we should not be surprised and should not complain if Departments then introduce many regulations that we had not foreseen.

In conclusion, I make a final plea to the Minister to act with his characteristic even-handedness, fairness and understanding and accept the amendment.

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): As the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) said, we had much debate in Committee about the independence of the agency as a non-ministerial Department. It might help the House if I reiterate the rules under which the agency will operate.

In its day-to-day operation, the agency will be at arm's length from Ministers, and staff will be accountable to its chairman and members. It will have the unprecedented independence to publish the advice that it gives to Ministers. However, it would be wrong to suggest that the agency should be wholly independent of democratically accountable Ministers. Ministers will retain ultimate responsibility for policy and legislation, and it is right that they should do so, but they will turn to the agency for policy advice. The agency will be the Government's primary source of advice on food safety and standards.

I am not convinced that the amendment is helpful, because Ministers will naturally explain to the agency why they are asking for advice, and the agency will have powers to publish any information in its possession, unless that is specifically prohibited by an enactment or Community obligations, or unless publication would make the agency in contempt of court. It would, therefore, be able to publish information about requests from Ministers.

It is not, however, appropriate to place on Ministers of the Crown, Government Departments, the National Assembly for Wales, Scottish Ministers and Northern Ireland Departments the extra duty to publish immediately the reason why they are asking for advice. In sensitive matters, such as negotiations or legal proceedings, publication of the reasons for requesting advice might be premature. As we reflected in Committee, it might also be socially embarrassing. A Minister might seek advice from the agency about whether to attend a particular function, and if the answer were blunt, clearly embarrassment could result.

Although the power can be used to ensure that advice is given, there is no way in which it can be used to dictate the content of that advice. It will be left to the agency to decide how to respond to requests for advice, information and assistance from Ministers. Records of the agency's decisions and the information on which they are based will be publicly available, which means that information about Ministers' requests to the agency and how those requests were dealt with will become publicly available.

It is very important that we do not make Ministers' dealings with the agency so constrained that they simply find alternative sources of advice within existing Departments. Clearly, that would undermine one of the important purposes for which the agency is being established.

I turn now to amendment No. 12. I hope that I can reassure the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) and put to rest some of his worst fears.

I reiterate a point that was forcefully made in Committee by my hon. Friend the Minister of State—that the clause does not give the agency unusual powers. The agency has only the powers given to it by the Bill, but it is very important technically and legally that the agency has the powers that it is given by the clause so that it can, for instance, enter into contracts to have its offices cleaned and arrange for stationery supplies. Everything that the agency does will obviously be constrained by the extent of its powers, which are clearly set out in the Bill, and the very important qualifications about the exercise of its powers, especially in relation to the assessment of risk and proportionality.

The agency will publish an annual report, which will be laid before Parliament. We have made clear the importance that we, as Ministers, attach to the annual report, but I think that if we were to publish in the annual report a list of photocopying contracts and stationery orders, it would make dull reading.

I finish by saying that, far from being anything as exotic as the Martini clause, clause 21 is the stuff of basic departmental and agency housekeeping. I assure the hon. Member for Ludlow that the Food and Drink Federation has contributed its views freely throughout a long process of consultation, and where appropriate, the Bill has been improved as a result of its representations. However, if we were to put on the face of the Bill the terms under which the agency would order its pencils and monitor its paper supplies, it would diminish the enormous importance that we attach to its overriding task of protecting public health and improving standards of food safety. I therefore very much hope that the hon. Member for Meriden will withdraw the amendment.

Mrs. Spelman: I have carefully listened to the right hon. Lady's explanation. She stated the circumstances in which it might not be appropriate for reasons to be published immediately when the agency was requested to exercise its powers, and I can envisage circumstances in which that would be true. It was a bit of a let-down to hear the rather benign examples of purposes for which the exotically titled clause 21 would be used but, having listened to those explanations—

Mr. Gill: I wonder whether my hon. Friend thought, as I did, that the Minister trivialised clause 21 by referring to the unnecessary procedure of having to report matters relating to office cleaning, stationery supplies, pencil orders, paper supplies and so on. However, clause 21(2)(d) talks about the instituting of criminal proceedings. We are not talking only about trivial items such as the ordering of pencils. This is a very serious point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot make a speech during an intervention; that is just not on.

Mrs. Spelman: Obviously, I appreciate the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) because we approach the point from the same direction, but in Committee, we received an explanation of the circumstances in which it might be necessary for the agency to institute criminal proceedings, and I refer him to Hansard on that point. The wording of clause 21 is difficult for a reader coming to it for the first time, but we accept that, as the Minister said in Committee, it should be read in conjunction with the other clauses.

It is interesting to note, and worth placing on the record given the likelihood that we shall not reach Government amendment No. 28, that that amendment requires the Secretary of State to publish reasons for giving directions to the Food Standards Agency in the event of a breach of duty. We welcome that amendment. It shows that the Government are sensitive to the point that there are times when it is paramount to make the reasons explicit and publish them. We accept that there may be other times when it is inappropriate—in particular, the timing may be inappropriate—to publish the reasons for requiring the agency to exercise its powers. For these reasons, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Gill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I, too, listened carefully to the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Lady giving way?

Mrs. Spelman: I have withdrawn the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 11

POWERS OF ENTRY FOR PERSONS CARRYING OUT OBSERVATIONS

Ms Jowell: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 5, line 3, leave out from 'out' to end of line and insert

'any observations under section 10 specified in the authorisation.

(1A) No authorisation under this section shall be issued except in pursuance of a decision taken by the Agency itself or by a committee, sub-committee or member of the Agency acting on behalf of the Agency.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 20 to 27.

Ms Jowell: We had a full and detailed debate in Committee on the operation of clauses 11 and 14, to ensure specifically first, that only the agency, or one of its committees or sub-committees, or a member acting on behalf of the agency, authorised the use of powers of entry. Secondly, the Committee wished to ensure that the authorisation would be limited to a particular purpose if it was issued under clause 11—in relation to carrying out observations—which would be stated in the authorisation itself. We agreed that receipts for samples or copies of documents would be given on request.

Clause 11 deals with powers of entry for the purposes of carrying out observations, and clause 14 deals with monitoring the performance of enforcement authorities. The amendments bring the improvements that we debated in Committee in line with the powers set out in clauses 11 and 14.

When considering clause 11, we explained in detail the way in which we expected the powers of entry to be used. We stressed that they were not to be used for enforcement purposes, but were about information gathering to inform the agency's policy development role.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The Minister will be aware of my interest in the case of her Department v. Aldridge, involving Duckett's cheese. Can I be reassured that the evidence that has been revealed through that long saga has been taken into account in drawing up the details of clause 11? The right hon. Lady will be aware that there are real concerns in the industry about the way in which enforcement powers in previous legislation have been used. I think that most people recognise that big sledgehammers were used to crack small nuts.

Ms Jowell: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Department of Health won the recent appeal following the judicial review. The judgment reflected the fact that there had been an imminent risk to health, and that the application of the powers that the Department and I took were proportionate in light of the degree of risk. Given that it was the first time that the power had been applied and that it has major consequences for businesses, we have sought to examine the effects of its operation.

Let no one be in any doubt about the risk to health that was posed by the contamination of cheese by E. coli 0157—contamination that left a 12-year-old boy on dialysis and seriously ill in hospital. We acted, and we were right to act. The experience of operating the power informed our consideration of the way in which the agency should carry out observation as part of its surveillance function.

I shall deal briefly with the amendments relating to clause 14. Authorisations issued under clause 14 do not need to state the purpose, because the power of entry is already clearly limited to monitoring the performance of enforcement authorities. Amendments Nos. 21 and 25 meet our commitment that receipts for samples or copies of documents should be provided on request.

Amendments Nos. 23 and 24 to clause 11 and amendments Nos. 26 and 27 to clause 14 are minor drafting changes. I explained in Committee that we would introduce drafting changes to clarify ambiguities. On several occasions in Committee, the Opposition proposed a code of practice governing the exercise of the powers. It was agreed that there should be clear rules governing the behaviour of authorised persons exercising powers of entry.

With these Government amendments, the Bill will provide rules, which we expect to be supplemented by general guidance. In light of that, we do not see the need for a statutory code of practice. We agree that there should be guidance, and that that should be available to members of the public.

Mrs. Spelman: I shall be brief, as we are keen for discussion to proceed to the next set of amendments, which are a significant group.

We welcome the Government's amendments, which respond to some of the concerns that we raised in Committee about the powers of entry. We are pleased that the ambiguities that we pointed out in the original drafting of clauses 11 and 14 will be resolved satisfactorily. The Government's amendments improve on the proposal for a code of practice. The Bill itself will make it clear how Food Standards Agency officers should conduct themselves upon entering commercial premises.

It would be right to record the residual concern of the Food and Drink Federation about the confidentiality of information that might be collected when the officers enter premises. The fact that a receipt will be given, as we requested in one of our original amendments, should allay some of the fears about transparency. We are grateful for the Government's concessions and take some pride in having had a hand in amending the Bill to ensure that the powers being granted to the FSA are less likely to be abused in relation to commercial interests.

Ms Jowell: May I clarify that point? It was one of the issues that we took on board following the Special Select Committee. Unofficial disclosure of commercially sensitive information collected in the course of observation will be an offence. That is clearly stated in the Bill.

Mrs. Spelman: We perfectly understand that, and we are pleased that that requirement extends also to anybody who might now accompany the authorised FSA officer. We asked for that and we are glad to see it.

For the sake of total transparency in all our doings, I should like to record that, in expressing our gratitude for these concessions, we pushed our luck quite far in Committee. It was suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) that the Government's recognition of that might extend to inviting us to the party that traditionally follows the passage of a Bill through the House. I take this opportunity to record our gratitude for having received invitations to that party. It may be quite an historic occasion, and we record our thanks.

Dr. Brand: I rise briefly to welcome the amendments and say that they have made worth while the many hours—occasionally not very interesting hours—that we spent in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 20, in page 5, line 7, leave out from 'out' to end of line and insert

'the observations specified in his authorisation'.

No. 21, in page 5, line 18, leave out from 'shall' to end of line 19 and insert 'on request—

(a) produce his authorisation before exercising any powers under subsection (3); and

(b) provide a document identifying any sample taken, or documents copied, under those powers.'.

No. 22, in page 5, line 29, leave out from beginning to 'any' and insert

'If an authorised person who enters'.

No. 23, in page 5, line 31 leave out from 'secret' to 'guilty' in line 32 and insert

'he is, unless the disclosure is made in the performance of his duty.'.—[Ms Jowell.]

Clause 12

MONITORING OF ENFORCEMENT ACTION

8 pm

Mr. Paice: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 6, line 21, at end insert—

'(6) In any case where the Agency itself or a body for which it is accountable is the enforcement authority, subsection (1) shall not have effect and the function of monitoring enforcement shall be held by the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in schedule 3, page 27, line 27, leave out from beginning to 'and' in line 28.

No. 18, in schedule 4, page 32, line 35, leave out from 'omitted' to end of line 37.

Mr. Paice: The Minister of State suggested that we might not reach this group of amendments, but I am pleased that we have, as it enables us primarily to discuss the Meat Hygiene Service. I shall not take a long time rehearsing the arguments because we spent some time on the matter in Committee. However, I have taken the opportunity to look again at what the Minister said in reply to that debate, and I have tried to address the issue in amendments Nos. 3 and 9. I shall come to amendment No. 18 in a moment.

Amendment No. 3 turns on its head the approach that the Opposition previously adopted, which was to prevent the FSA taking over the MHS. The reason we do not want the two to be in cahoots is quite clear. We want a clear distinction between enforcement and the monitoring of that enforcement. We recognise that there will be times, in extremis, when the FSA will have to take on enforcement measures—if, for example, another authority fails in its duties; that is in the Bill and we accept it—but to take it on in that situation for, one assumes, a temporary period, is different from its being part and parcel of the agency's usual functions.

In Committee, the Minister clearly said:

"The chief executive"— of the MHS—

"does not create policy; he receives policy instructions from MAFF. Likewise, he will receive them from the FSA staff".

That clearly indicates to me that there is a problem.

The Minister went on to refer to the idea of the FSA being "born out of the suspicion that the Ministry should not ride two horses and the paradox of a regulatory Ministry sponsoring the food and the farming industries."

I accept that in the way in which he said it, but that paradox applies equally to the idea of the FSA setting some regulations, enforcing them through the MHS and then monitoring their enforcement.

There are not many other walks of public life in which both the enforcement and the monitoring of the effectiveness of that enforcement are done by the same body.

Mr. Rooker: There is not much time to put this on the record, but the auditing of the MHS goes beyond the FSA. The EU Commission's Food and Veterinary Office and the state veterinary service, which is not part of the FSA, will all be involved in this function.

Mr. Paice: The Minister makes precisely my next point. In Committee, he said:

"the MHS is accountable to EU inspectors, who can arrive with no warning. The inspections will be audited by the state veterinary service as well as by the veterinary public health unit of the joint food safety and standards group".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 13 July 1999; c. 299-300.]

If all those bodies monitor the MHS, why on earth do we need the FSA as well?

Mr. Rooker rose—

Mr. Paice: I shall give the Minister time to reply; he does not need to intervene.

I do not understand why it is necessary for the FSA to fulfil that role. The Minister worried members of the Committee when he said that the Government were still exploring the management arrangements between the FSA and the MHS. He spoke about Chinese walls of separation. We are not at all convinced that they will be as effective as they ought to be.

Amendment No. 9 was effectively given to us by the Government in Committee when the Minister pointed out the implications of another amendment that I had tabled. He now has two opportunities to accept our argument in two different ways. If the Government are obsessed with pursuing the idea of putting the MHS with the FSA, they can do so as long as they leave the monitoring of enforcement with MAFF and with those other bodies to which he has referred. Amendment No. 3 would allow them to do that.

Amendment No. 18, which relates to schedule 4, is designed to control the overweening power of the agency. The Minister for Public Health, who seems to have evaporated from the Front Bench, said that we have spent a lot of time talking about the independence of the agency. She is quite right: there is no contradiction between seeking to establish an independent agency and ensuring that it does not have excessive power. That amendment is designed to ensure that, in at least one area, the agency's power would be constrained. It would not be given the powers that Ministers have under the Food Safety Act 1990.

Other brief contributions may be made, but I am sure that the Minister will have a moment or two to reply before we run out of time.

Dr. Brand: The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has told us that he was riding two horses; I believe he has jumped on the wrong one.

We have supported the Conservatives in their contention that it is not appropriate to site the Meat Hygiene Service with the Food Standards Agency because its size is disproportionate to that of the agency, but I firmly believe that the FSA ought to have a role in monitoring and policy setting for all the enforcement agencies. If the FSA had been in existence a few years ago and had done the job properly, the MHS would never have had to be set up. It would not have to be taken away from local authorities because there would have been a mechanism in place for intervention, short of the nuclear option, as described by the Minister, of direct ministerial intervention. We cannot support the amendment because it takes the wrong direction.

In time, if not tonight, I hope that the Minister will be able to describe how he has worked through the concept of separating the policy-setting function of the agency and the semi-autonomous role of the MHS in the execution of that function.

It is absolutely vital that the FSA sets clear criteria for what it considers to be failure by an enforcement authority. It would be quite wrong for it to have powers that could be applied quite arbitrarily to, for example, a local standards agency or other enforcement agencies that are under local authority control. The criteria on performance must be clear, and one would expect warning systems so that an agency does not suddenly come down like a ton of bricks on an unsuspecting small district council that does not realise that it is under-performing.

We cannot support the amendment although the spirit behind it was right, separating the Meat Hygiene Service from the Food Standards Agency. The hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire has taken the wrong horse of the two that he might have taken.

Mr. Rooker: I should like to make a serious attempt to respond to the debate. This is one of the most important groups of amendments, which we started on, if I recall correctly, at 8 o'clock. [Interruption.] Oh, the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) is back. We have had the debates without him and made reasonable progress.

There is no way I can do justice to the issue, which is important. I do not criticise the Opposition for raising their concerns, but I can make only general, rather than specific, comments.

The prime reason for the Meat Hygiene Service and, indeed, the Dairy Hygiene Service being, effectively, an integral part of the agency is that they are 100 per cent. concerned with food safety, whereas the other agencies under MAFF, including the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and the Pesticides Safety Directorate, are not exclusively related to food safety. They are out. They will remain as executive agencies, but with all the links to the agency.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rooker: No.

The other thing that I want to make clear—I have lost count of how many times I said it in Committee, but it has to be said so that it is taken on board by those who look at our proceedings—is that there are no plans or agenda to create a national enforcement authority. That is the position. The Bill does not allow one to be set up. One could argue that if a local authority failed in its enforcement duties the powers are in the Bill to have that dealt with. That is not envisaged. It is not part of any hidden agenda, whatever anyone might say about how the Meat Hygiene Service was formed in the first place.

In Committee I discovered that, in some quarters, there is an abiding hatred of the Meat Hygiene Service. As someone said a couple of days ago, there is a romantic attachment to the good old days, when 300 separate local authorities checked the abattoirs. At that time, there were 900 abattoirs. We inherited only 300—a few closed in the 18 years of Tory rule.

As we saw in the public hearings of the Phillips inquiry, during those halcyon, romantic days of local authorities checking meat hygiene in abattoirs, there was an abject breakdown in the controls, which led to BSE infectivity going into the food chain, so it is not true that things were 100 per cent. perfect when 300 local authorities were dealing with the matter.

With hindsight, I accept that the actions of the previous Government in setting up the Meat Hygiene Service were totally correct. There are no plans to devolve it back. Nevertheless, there is no agenda to take local authorities' role at any level—that of environmental health officers or trading standards officers. They are the front-line police throughout the food chain. We want to work in partnership with them. That is the way in which the Bill has been set up.

We will make separate arrangements for the management reporting of the Meat Hygiene Service within the Foods Standards Agency and for the audit. I am convinced that we can do that. If it can be done in the private sector, with audit companies both carrying out internal and external audits of their clients and maintaining Chinese walls, we can do it here. If I had had more time, I could have put on the record some of the management mechanisms that we propose to introduce, but perhaps that can be done in another place.

The genuine concerns that have been raised have been met by the content of the Bill and the way in which we intend the structures to operate in practice. There is still some work to do, but there are a few months in which to do it.

It being six hours after the commencement of proceedings on consideration of the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [this day], put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Amendment negatived.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

Local Government Finance

That the Local Government Finance (England) Special Grant Report (No. 48) on 1999–2000 Special Grant for developing new approaches to commissioning services for drug misusers (HC 513), which was laid before this House on 6th July, be approved.—[Mr. Allen.]

PETITIONS

Coleridge Community College

8.18 pm

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I am proud to present a petition—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I remind hon. Members that an hon. Member is presenting a petition. They must leave the Chamber quietly.

Mrs. Campbell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am proud to present a petition signed by 21,400 residents of Cambridge, opposing the closure of Coleridge community college on the grounds that its closure would mean the loss of an excellent school and a well-used community college, and increasing congestion as the children are bussed across the city.

The petition states:

The Petition of residents of Cambridge and elsewhere declares, that we totally oppose the closure of Coleridge Community College, Radegund Rd, Cambridge.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to do all in his power to prevent Cambridgeshire County Council from closing the College.

And the Petitioners remain.

To lie upon the Table.

West Midlands Special Needs Transport Ltd.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): It is my pleasure to present a petition signed by my friend Councillor Renée Spector and more than 10,000 other users and supporters of West Midlands Special Needs Transport Ltd., otherwise known as Ring and Ride.

The petition states:

That the present system of rebates of fuel duty paid to Commercial Passenger Transport Companies, who operate scheduled public transport services, is not paid to "Ring and Ride" or "Dial a Ride" type services. We consider that this system unfairly discriminates against persons with mobility difficulties to whom these services are the equivalent of normal bus services, which they are physically unable to use.

To lie upon the Table.

Hunted Animals

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): I have pleasure in presenting a petition signed by constituents who are members of the Campaign for the Protection of Hunted Animals.

The petition reads:

To the House of Commons. The petition of residents of the constituency of Maidstone and the Weald declares that we believe that hunting with dogs is cruel and unnecessary and has no place in a modern Britain. The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons calls on the Government to act on the overwhelming mandate it has received from MPs and the public to end hunting by making a clear commitment by the year 2000 to legislate for its abolition. And the petitioners remain etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Elderly (East Sussex)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Allen.]

8.22 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): The Government appear to be obsessed with youth. They are keen on cool Britannia, and the so-called rebranding of Britain. Yet, as a country, we are getting older—some of us faster than others. I am constantly amazed by the number of 100th-birthday parties to which I am invited in Eastbourne. I see from a newsletter issued recently by the Debate of the Age that Posh Spice can expect her new baby, improbably named Brooklyn Adams-Beckham, to live to the ripe old age of 130. It sometimes seems, however, that the Government are oblivious of those simple facts, and even that their policies, taken together, are designed to disadvantage older people. I think that I can claim to know what I am talking about: roughly 40 per cent. of my voters are over retirement age, and I am co-chairman of the all-party group for older people.

Almost the Government's first act was to abolish tax relief for retired people who had private medical insurance. I received many letters on the subject. For many such people, who had been in corporate schemes when they were working, tax relief was what made maintaining their health cover in retirement just possible. As a result of the Government's action, many had to give it up, or reduce the extent of their cover. I even initiated a debate on the matter, but the Government were deaf to all entreaties.

Then the Government reneged on their clear pre-election pledge to legislate against age discrimination. We all know from our experience as constituency Members how often able older people aged 50 or even younger are tossed on the scrap heap. We have a voluntary code of conduct; no doubt good employers are already following it, but bad ones will not.

Nor has the Chancellor been kind to older people. In his first Budget, he ripped off pension funds to the tune of £5 billion. Then we had the abolition of dividend tax credits, which directly prejudices 600,000 mainly elderly non-taxpayers. The married couples allowance was removed for couples who will be under 65 in April 2000. Widows have lost their bereavement allowance, which has a particular effect on older widows. Moreover, 250,000 women will be losers under the new rules for widows benefit.

Many older people in Eastbourne and elsewhere are very dependent on their cars, but this Chancellor is trying to tax them off the road. Now, we hear that the Government are intending to abolish concessionary television licences. What next, I wonder—especially when the BBC is seeking to raise the fee to well above £100?

The Government are moving towards a two-tier, means-tested state pension system that will penalise those of my constituents who have been thrifty during all their working lives. The so-called minimum pension guarantee is a fraud on pensioners, as more than 1 million pensioners will simply not be eligible for it.

Then there is the state earnings-related pension scheme scandal. As from April 2000, widows and widowers will be able to inherit only half of their late spouse's SERPS entitlement. Despite the fact that the change was made as long ago as 1986, until relatively recently, the Benefits Agency was misleading my constituents, and those of many other hon. Members, who have been affected by the change. In common with other hon. Members, I referred cases to the ombudsman. I am pleased that Ministers now accept that the problem must be examined, with a view to compensation being paid. I do not know whether the Minister will be able today to shed any light on the matter.

When in opposition, Labour said that things could only get better—but surely it could not have been speaking about our national health service. After a recent debate that I initiated, the Minister ordered an urgent inquiry into nursing at Eastbourne district general hospital. Our local NHS has also had cuts—in chiropody services, for example—that cause great distress to many of my elderly constituents. In all, about 300 people were thrown off podiatry waiting lists.

The royal commission on long-term care deliberated for 18 months, but its conclusions have now effectively been shunted into a siding by the Government. While the commission deliberated, an estimated 75,000 people had to sell their homes to pay for care. When will Ministers tackle the very real problems of funding long-term care for the elderly?

As the Minister knows, many older people are cared for, or are carers themselves. I have had letters from constituents in their 70s and 80s who have taken on the role of carer, often for a spouse suffering from Alzheimer's or another condition. Hard-pressed health services and social services departments are struggling to help when they are able, and I know that the Minister has taken a close personal interest in carers' issues. Although some of the Government's proposals on the matter deserve a cautious welcome, the extra funding announced recently works out at an additional 15p a week—which is hardly enough to recognise the billions of pounds saved to taxpayers each year by the estimated 5.7 million voluntary carers in the United Kingdom.

Taking all those factors together, one could be forgiven for asking: what do the Government have against the elderly?

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): My hon. Friend is analysing accurately the damage that the Government are doing to elderly people. Is it not also true that people who have fought for the United Kingdom, and lived long lives here, resent the Government for putting the euro ahead of the pound sterling and for selling our gold reserves at knock-down prices?

Mr. Waterson: My hon. Friend makes a very cogent point on a view that is held by many of my elderly constituents.

The most important and pressing issue that I should like to raise today affecting the elderly in East Sussex is the plight of independent residential care homes, which face two major problems: a Labour Government, and a Lib-Lab pact running the county council.

I recently addressed a meeting, in Eastbourne town hall, of more than 100 worried care home operators. Some of them had already gone out of business, whereas others were under pressure from their banks. They told me that they were facing a triple whammy. East Sussex pays the lowest fees to the private sector of any county in the United Kingdom. The current rate is £209, which is made worse by the fact that the county council pays its own homes the equivalent of £402 per person per week—an incredible difference of almost £200. The situation is rightly perceived as unfair by the private sector.

Furthermore, by insisting on keeping its own homes open, the county is wasting millions of pounds that could be better spent in the private sector. That is partly a matter of political dogma. I pay tribute to the dedication of staff in the county council-run homes. However, there is no less commitment in private homes, where the facilities are often more modern and more comfortable. It is therefore all the more distasteful when local Liberal Democrat politicians try to make political capital by claiming that residents of those homes would not receive treatment at least as good in the private sector.

Indeed, it is interesting that, in principle, the ruling group seems to have accepted the wisdom of disposing of the county's homes, despite what is said in its focus leaflets from time to time. As Councillor Peter Jones pointed out in a letter to me the other day, in 1998–99, the group tried to sell three homes as going concerns—those that were most non-compliant with current minimum standards.

The Conservatives on the council warned that the poor state of the homes meant that the group would almost certainly fail. Indeed, after some months, the group had failed to find a single credible buyer. There is a real problem here, with the county homes—despite the best efforts of staff—falling below the standards required in this modern age.

This is nothing new. I drew attention to the problem in a debate before the last election. On 19 February 1997, in an Adjournment debate, I said that "even if the Government could be persuaded to give a few million extra pounds to East Sussex, there would be no guarantee that the money would find its way through the system to independent care home owners."

I regret to say that nothing has changed. The same bunch of Liberal Democrats are, in effect, still running the county.

I pointed out in the 1997 debate that the disparity between what the council spent on its own homes and that spent in the private sector was £150. The gap has widened in the intervening period. The then Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), said that East Sussex was spending £5 million more than it needed. He went on to say:

"When a local authority is complaining that it does not have enough money, I cannot understand how it can justify spending about £152 a person a week extra just by placing them in its own homes."—[Official Report, 19 February 1997; Vol. 290, c. 890-898.]

Does the Minister agree with his Conservative predecessor? Has he an up-to-date calculation of the money being wasted in this way by the county council? Does he agree that the council is in danger of abusing its dominant purchasing power in this instance? Will he initiate an urgent inquiry into the policy of the county council?

The council claims, with some justification, that it does not get enough funding from the Government. We know that the Government have cut grants for areas such as East Sussex. They have also rigged the calculation of grants, so they no longer fully reflect the effect of large numbers in our elderly population locally. Will he try to justify the level of funding for East Sussex?

We are dealing with Liberal Democrats, so they must look for someone else to blame. It is a bit difficult when they are, effectively, in a coalition with Labour, both locally and nationally. They are talking to Ministers about an all-party approach, but the harsh reality is that they are part of the problem, not part of the solution.

The owners of homes are threatened with over-regulation, and they have the working time directive and the minimum wage to contend with. It is a matter not just of the rules themselves, but of the extra record-keeping that is involved.

As if that were not enough, we have the Government-sponsored report from the Centre for Policy on Ageing, which calls for some nationally required standards, including those relating to room sizes. This is all very well in an ideal world, and we should all aspire to ever-higher standards. However, the plain fact is that many existing homes would have to close if those proposals were implemented. The physical standards proposed are a major problem, but so are the proposals about staffing, sharing rooms and so on. This could be the final straw for many homes. We recently debated that worrying development—at my instigation—in the all-party ageing and older people group.

I am pleased that Ministers confirmed to me recently that the proposals would be subject to proper consultation later this year. Will the Minister outline his plans for the consultation and confirm that he has a genuinely open mind? I am particularly indebted to Terry Fribbens of the East Sussex Independent Care Group and Carole Alford of the Registered Nursing Home Association for bringing this dreadful state of affairs to my attention.

I have heard also from many individuals—too many to name here. Here are some examples of the authentic voice of the independent care sector in my area. A letter from a lady who runs a residential home in my constituency said:

"The private sector providing Residential Care Homes have been persecuted for too long . . . What we want to know is why we the private sector are paid almost half the fees that the Councils pay themselves. This is grossly unfair."

A lady from another home who attended a meeting that I addressed recently complained about the 1 per cent. or thereabouts increase given by the county to the private sector when it increased the fees for its own homes by 6 per cent. She talked about people in the sector being caused real difficulties by the squeeze from the county council.

I can tell the Minister without fear of contradiction that there is a major threat hanging over the independent care sector in East Sussex. At least 24 homes have closed in East Sussex, Brighton and Hove in the past year. That is extremely worrying, because they provide more than 90 per cent. of the care home rooms in East Sussex. If they are driven out of business, where are the people in need to be looked after? Certainly not in the public sector.

In our area, the residential care sector is a major part of the local economy, employing about 10,000 people. They are victims of the attitude of the Lib-Lab pact at county hall: a mixture of dogma and incompetence. The Government have promised that this is the year of delivering on their election promises across the board. What will they do to help?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on raising these important matters. He spoke about the Government's policy towards older people and how we are going to tackle hardship and poverty among them. I rebut his allegation that we are indifferent or have not developed effective policies for tackling those issues, because I strongly believe that we have.

If we are to succeed in tackling poverty and the social exclusion that is its direct consequence, we have to take effective action right across Government. That is exactly what we are doing. Past attempts to deal with these issues—including those by the Government of whom the hon. Gentleman was a supporter—have principally focused on short-term alleviation and very little has been done to prevent problems occurring in the future.

Our approach is radically different and dynamic. It is based on tackling the causes of poverty and social exclusion, not merely alleviating the symptoms. We are determined to create a fairer society in which all our citizens have opportunities to maximise their potential. Fundamentally, our strategy is about investment in individuals and communities to equip them to take control of their own lives and to get out of dependency and deprivation.

The hon. Gentleman has understandable concerns about hardship and poverty for older people in and around his constituency. Our policies will directly benefit those people. For many people, retirement is a time of opportunity, fulfilment, and contribution to the family and society, but for too many it can still be a time of financial insecurity, isolation and poor access to services.

Our policy priorities are to ensure that more of tomorrow's pensioners can retire on a decent income, and to tackle the problems of low income and social exclusion among today's pensioners, while improving opportunities for older people to live secure, fulfilling and active lives.

We are reforming pensions to give people real opportunities to save for their retirement. Our Green Paper "Partnerships in Pensions" set out our proposals for a new contract for pensioners, including dramatic improvements in state second pensions for low earners, carers and disabled people, and a better deal for middle and higher earners through new low-cost stakeholder schemes.

The hon. Gentleman failed to mention the fact that we have announced a £4 billion package, over the lifetime of this Parliament, to support our poorest pensioners. We have introduced a more generous minimum income guarantee for pensioners provided through income support and we announced in the Budget the introduction of a minimum tax guarantee to take 100,000 pensioners out of tax altogether.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye): That policy has been well received, certainly in less well-heeled constituencies than that of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), such as mine. More than 10,000 of my constituents have had the benefit of the minimum pension guarantee and more than 20,000 have benefited from the winter fuel payment. That has made an enormous difference, particularly in view of the Government's agreement that that minimum pension will be increased in line with wages, not just inflation.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for helping to correct the misleading impression that the hon. Gentleman has tried to give. The Government are clear that we intend to be fair to all our pensioners. That is precisely what our policies will do. My hon. Friend referred to winter fuel payments. We are giving every pensioner £100 to help with winter fuel heating costs. We have put in place a more generous home energy efficiency scheme and have ended VAT on domestic fuel which, I understand, the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends voted for during the last Parliament—not a popular policy with pensioners.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Government's general approach to older people. In addition to the hardships endured by older people because of their circumstances, many are not helped by the fragmentation of, or lack of access to, local services. The hon. Gentleman himself referred to some of those problems.

The Government are fully committed to providing better services that can better meet the needs of older people. We shall do so by listening to and consulting older people themselves. This summer, as part of the international year of older persons, Ministers have been setting up and participating in a string of listening events up and down the country. They are organised by local organisations and attended by older people, who have the chance to put their views directly to Ministers. I am attending two of these events. I and other Ministers will listen very hard to what is said. At local level, the Government are supporting the better government for older people programme. This involves local agencies working together on behalf of older people, consulting with them, and ensuring that services are appropriate and convenient.

I now want to focus on this Government's record on health and social care services for older people, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We have achieved much in the short time that we have been in office. Much of what we have set in train will benefit older people throughout the country, including those who are fortunate enough to live in East Sussex.

The Government's polices centre on a number of key themes. Foremost is promoting the independence of individuals and listening to what they say they want from local services. We want to give older people more say in and control over the services that they receive, and we want to ensure that they have access to services when and where they need them. I shall briefly mention just some of our initiatives. The hon. Gentleman referred to the royal commission which we set up in 1997 to look into options for the funding of long-term care. That fulfilled a manifesto commitment. The report of the commission was published only in March 1999, and the Government are carefully considering their response to the proposals of both the majority and minority of commissioners, and the many comments that have been made on the report by a variety of organisations. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the report contained 24 main recommendations and a host of other minor recommendations, too. It is right, therefore, that we spend an appropriate time on developing our response.

The hon. Gentleman expressed his concern about the existing rules which, he felt, were harsh and unfair. I hope that he will not mind my reminding him that the rules he was describing were the rules that he voted for and sustained in Government over many years.

We also introduced free eye tests for people aged 60 and over from April this year. We have spent significant amounts of new resources developing new health action zones. I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in the situation of carers. He will remember that in February this year we published, for the first time in this country, a new national strategy for carers, backed up with a new special grant of £140 million over three years to help local authorities provide a better and wider range of services to support carers. During the course of his remarks, the hon. Gentleman again failed to mention that the Government whom he supported had plenty of opportunities to introduce a similar mechanism of support for carers. Sadly, his Government never quite managed to get round to doing that.

Earlier this summer, we published a new charter, "You and Your Services", which local authorities are certainly consulting on now. We hope to see those new local charters introduced from April 2000.

Through a range of initiatives, we are getting health and social services authorities to work more closely and effectively together. For example, we have published new national priorities guidance with clear targets. In "Partnerships in Action", we set out a new range of operational flexibilities which will allow the NHS and social services to work more effectively together. Those proposals are now enshrined in new legislation and we expect to implement them as soon as possible.

We are also developing this year, for implementation next year, the new national service framework for older people, which will be issued to health and local authorities in April 2000. This framework will focus on those parts of the health service that are particularly important to older people; and, again for the first time, we will set new standards to increase the quality of local and health authority services and equity of access to them.

In summary, we are improving health and social care services by getting agencies to work more closely together and by ensuring that people receive services when and where they need them. The Government will achieve a great deal for older people, and lessen the hardships that many experience as they try to access local services.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne referred to some of the problems in his constituency and county, so I shall now address my remarks to his concerns. He said much about local authority finance. I should remind him that within the total amount for local government in the current financial year, the Government have provided a 6.3 per cent. increase for social services departments across the country. For the first time, we have guaranteed that national resources for social services will increase in real terms for each of the following two years, enabling social services departments to plan ahead, knowing that there will be increasing funding. In fact, social services will receive almost £3 billion more in total over the next three years.

This year, for example, East Sussex county council plans to spend £39 million of its £89 million social services budget on services for older people. East Sussex, Brighton and Hove health authority has £505 million at its disposal—3.76 per cent. more than in 1998–99. Its budget for services for older people currently exceeds £130 million.

The hon. Gentleman referred to our manifesto promises. We have honoured our election manifesto pledge to make the distribution system for local authority funding fairer by introducing some changes to the standard spending assessment formula. It is clearly for local authorities, not the Government, to decide on the local allocation of funding to services in accordance with local circumstances and priorities. That is a particularly pertinent point in this debate, as East Sussex has latitude to use its resources as it sees fit, in line with local needs, priorities and policies. Two of the SSA changes that we made this year clearly did not benefit East Sussex. There is no point pretending otherwise, but I am absolutely certain that we were right to make those changes.

In addition to resources delivered through SSAs, the Government have made additional resources available to local authorities. In addition to the carers' special grant, new special partnership and prevention grants are helping local authorities to work with health authorities to develop preventive and rehabilitative services for older people and other adults. These three new grants, totalling £890 million over three years, will help social services to promote independence and develop community-based services. Older people living in East Sussex will certainly benefit from the new grants, which amounted this year in East Sussex to £3.2 million, in addition to the total social services SSA.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne referred to his concerns about the commissioning of residential care in East Sussex. We certainly want local authorities to commission social care services that deliver best value. Best value is the key element in the Government's agenda to improve the quality of local authority services and the efficiency and economy with which they are delivered. Best value will help to ensure that local authorities commission fairly and openly on the basis of a full consideration of costs, quality and outcomes. A new performance management framework will support the delivery of best value services.

Intrinsic to our approach to the provision of services must be even-handedness. We are pragmatic, not dogmatic, over who should provide services. We have no ideological bias in favour of either independent sector or public sector providers. We want local authorities to have an even-handed approach to internal and external provision. Under best value we want decisions on services to be based on proper and transparent reviews of services and accountable decision-making, which reflects local objectives and is based on the aspirations and views of local people and their communities.

I understand that the relationships between the local authority and independent providers in East Sussex have caused some concern in recent years. As he reminded us, the hon. Gentleman brought those matters to the attention of the House in an Adjournment debate more than two years ago. I fully understand his concerns. However, I understand that the new director of social services is keen to improve relationships and I hope that that will lead to greater co-operation in the future. Relationships between local authorities and independent providers have certainly been improving elsewhere in the country.

[Mr. Hutton]

One problem in East Sussex to which the hon. Gentleman referred seems to be the large number of residential and nursing homes in that area. Although extensive use is made of the independent sector—89 per cent. of local authority residential care placements are in independent homes—the large number of homes means that fee rates for residential and nursing homes are depressed.

When it comes to the mechanics of contracting, we believe that the details of contracting arrangements between local authorities and suppliers are primarily matters for local decision. The Government do not set the rates at which local authorities should contract. We do, however, acknowledge that local authorities' commissioning activities need to improve, and we intend to assist that process of improvement. Strategic planning needs to pursue agreed strategic objectives, which are transparent to users and providers. Market management and contract setting should involve a variety of contract types, with contract prices that reflect providers' costs and planned outcomes for users. Local authorities need to ensure that services meet people's specific needs, and that groups with particular needs, such as ethnic minorities, are better served. We set out that agenda in more detail in our recent White Paper.

We are taking a number of steps to help local authorities and providers to develop those relationships, and to think through their social services agenda. For example, we have just completed a well-attended series of highly productive regional conferences, designed to improve the arrangements for commissioning and paying for those residential services. One of the conferences was held in Brighton, and was attended by officers from East Sussex social services department and representatives from some of the independent homes in the East Sussex area.

Finally, I reassure the hon. Gentleman that I, like my predecessor, meet representatives from the independent sector quarterly to share information, views and concerns. The hon. Gentleman asked me to take a close interest in—

Orders of the Day

Criminal Cases Review (Insanity) Bill [Lords]

Order for Third Reading read.

9.33 am

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I need not detain the House long. This Bill has one simple purpose, which is to plug a small gap in the Criminal Appeal Act 1995. That Act set up the Criminal Cases Review Commission, which deals with alleged miscarriages of justice. The Bill empowers the commission to deal with cases—there are likely only to be a handful—in which a person has been found guilty but insane. That verdict was available to the courts until the 1960s, when it was replaced by a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.

The Criminal Appeal Act 1995 empowers the commission to deal with verdicts of not guilty by reason of insanity, but no one, myself included, foresaw that there might still remain a handful of disputed cases that dated from the earlier era when the verdict was guilty but insane. Consequently, the 1995 Act made no provision for such cases.

The case that brought the anomaly to light was that of Iain Hay Gordon who in 1953 was tried in Northern Ireland for the murder of a young woman. The case attracted enormous interest since the victim was the daughter of a prominent judge. There are good grounds for believing that Mr. Gordon was neither guilty nor insane, but those are not matters that need detain us—suffice it to say that Mr. Gordon, who is now frail and elderly and has long protested his innocence, applied in 1998 to the Criminal Cases Review Commission for his case to be re-examined.

The commission, after seeking legal advice, decided to refer back to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal the issue of whether it was empowered to consider cases involving a verdict of guilty but insane. The Northern Ireland Court of Appeal ruled that it was not—hence the need for this Bill.

Lord Ackner first attempted to introduce a Bill for this purpose in July last year, but it unfortunately failed to become law for lack of time. In March this year, he introduced the Bill before us, and as he said at the time, the omission of a verdict of guilty but insane from the 1995 Act is an error that has created a "longstanding and tragic absurdity" in the case of Iain Hay Gordon. Such an outcome was never intended by any of those—and I was one—who played a part in the passage of the 1995 Act. This Bill seeks to rectify that.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us whether there is a significant number of other likely cases in this category? Are we dealing with only one known case, or does the hon. Gentleman believe that there might be others—perhaps only a small number—to which the benefits that he is claiming for the Bill would apply?

Mr. Mullin: I am aware only of the case of Iain Hay Gordon. Although I could not give the right hon. Gentleman details, I have heard that there is at least one other, but it is unlikely that there are more than three or four because we are talking about cases that date from before the mid-1960s.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Even if the Gordon case is the only one which this Bill will correct, does the hon. Gentleman agree that that of itself is sufficient reason for passing it?

Mr. Mullin: I most certainly do. If Mr. Gordon is innocent, he has had hanging over him for more than 40 years a considerable burden. He wants to see that put right before he dies. The Criminal Cases Review Commission is extremely keen to deal with the case expeditiously, but cannot do so until the Bill becomes law. I therefore hope that everyone will co-operate towards that end.

I thank all those who have helped to address this problem, not least the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and Home Office civil servants, for the constructive part that they have played in the drafting and passage of the Bill. I acknowledge, too, the helpful approach of the Criminal Cases Review Commission and thank the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean)—himself a former Home Office Minister—for the constructive approach that I understand he intends to take.

I hope that the commission will do all that it can when the Bill becomes law to expedite consideration of Mr. Gordon's case. I am aware that it has a large backlog of cases and a policy of not giving priority to those who are at liberty unless there are exceptional circumstances. As I said in response to the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), there clearly are exceptional circumstances in this case: getting on for 40 years have elapsed since Mr. Gordon was convicted. Many of those who were directly involved in the case are already dead and Mr. Gordon is elderly and not in the best of health, and wishes to see the matter resolved in his lifetime.

I also gently draw the attention of the Criminal Cases Review Commission to recommendation 7 of the recent Home Affairs Committee report on the commission's work, which expressed the hope that, in the light of extra resources made available this year, some progress would be made on the backlog of cases involving persons at liberty.

I was glad to hear yesterday that the commission has started preliminary work on the Iain Hay Gordon case. I hope that the commission will regard the smooth passage that Parliament will, I hope, grant the Bill as a signal that we expect Mr. Gordon's case to be expedited. I, for one, will follow progress with interest.

I commend the Bill to the House.

9.40 am

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am most grateful to be called to speak, not only because I wish to support the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) in ensuring the Bill's passage but because, like him, I take a great interest in miscarriage of justice cases. The hon. Gentleman knows, as other Members of the House who were Members before 1992 may know, that my predecessor as Member for Harborough, Sir John Farr—now sadly dead—took a great interest, with the hon. Gentleman, in the case of the Birmingham Six.

I hope that I do not embarrass the hon. Member for Sunderland, South when I say that that was a most unusual marriage of minds. The hon. Gentleman is a radical journalist and a member of the Labour party and, apart from being a civilised person, has little in common with my predecessor—a farmer and a business man of the old school, who one might think would have no interest whatever in the misfortunes of the Birmingham Six. However, at least some of them ended up in Gartree prison for a while, which is in the Harborough constituency, and as a result of his going to meet and speak with some of the Birmingham Six, Sir John came to understand that there might well have been a miscarriage of justice in that case. Without the work of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South, with the help of my revered predecessor, the Birmingham Six might have been in prison to this day.

I come at this issue from a personal position of great interest in the justice system. I come at it as a practising member of the Bar—albeit I do not practise in the criminal courts except as an assistant recorder—and, I hope, as someone who generally is interested in injustice and putting right things that have gone wrong.

If the intervention that I made on the hon. Member for Sunderland, South does anything, it shows that if one man still lives who has or may have suffered a miscarriage of justice as a result of a drafting lacuna in the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964—which changed the relevant verdict in matters such as this from "guilty but insane" to "not guilty by reason of insanity"—and has been denied a proper review of his case, it is right and proper that the House, irrespective of party differences about law and order and so on, if they exist, should give the Bill a Third Reading.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Surely my hon. and learned Friend does not consider this case to be a priority for the Criminal Cases Review Commission? As the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) said, Mr. Iain Hay Gordon is at liberty, whereas others whose cases need to be reviewed are still in prison. In those circumstances, does my hon. and learned Friend agree that this case, although deserving, is not a priority?

Mr. Garnier: I do not know whether our deliberations today will order the commission's priorities. However, if the Bill becomes law, it will allow the Criminal Cases Review Commission to consider the case. Despite the willingness of the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal to consider the verdict in the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon, it found that, by virtue of the drafting aberration in the 1964 Act, it could not do so. It is not for me, for the House or for the Minister to tell the Criminal Cases Review Commission the order in which to consider cases.

I have a particular interest in a case involving the M25 murders. Just as Sir John Farr, my predecessor, went to meet and had dealings with members of the Birmingham Six who were temporarily resident in Gartree prison, I have had dealings with Mr. Raphael Rowe, who is no longer imprisoned in my constituency but was for some little time during the previous Parliament. As a consequence of representations that his lawyers, he and his fellow defendants made to me and other Members of Parliament—I am thinking in particular of my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir P. Beresford) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I advise the hon. and learned Gentleman that he may be going wide of the Bill before us, because he is dealing with cases that would not be affected by the Bill.

Mr. Garnier: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was seeking to show that the Criminal Cases Review Commission may have to deal with a number of cases as a consequence of this legislation—although not many—but that it was not for us to order its priorities. I was merely illustrating that by mentioning the case with which I had to deal. I have approached the Criminal Cases Review Commission on behalf of Mr. Raphael Rowe, and I am happy to say that, at last, that case has been referred to the Court of Appeal. It is not for us to say to the commission, "Look at this case before another", and it is not for us to tell the Court of Appeal how to order the list of referred cases.

As the hon. Member for Sunderland, South said, the Bill comes to us with a good degree of all-party and non-party agreement from the other place. It was first introduced in 1998, but fell as a result of lack of time. Fortunately, Lord Ackner was able to reintroduce it in March 1999, and the record is there in the Lords Hansard for those who wish to see how unanimous was the support for this small but important Bill. I invite my hon. Friends to join the hon. Member for Sunderland, South in supporting it.

The Bill introduces an entirely necessary, but humane and civilised way of righting a wrong. The wrong revealed was that in the case of Iain Hay Gordon. He was caught by the drafting error or omission following the amendment of the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, which simply changed the name of the verdict in cases such as this but had no real bearing on the stigma or status of the individual defendant.

For all I know, Mr. Hay Gordon may have killed the lady in question in the early 1950s. I believe that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South is one of those who think that he probably did not or may not have done. In any event, it seems wholly wrong that a person should be denied access to a review procedure by reason of an obvious drafting omission or error in the 1964 legislation.

The matter touches on the way in which we view the insanity defence. As I understand it, the vast majority of prosecuted mentally disordered offenders in this jurisdiction—England and Wales—are convicted rather than excused, and in most cases, mental disorder does not negate criminal responsibility, but instead may lead to treatment in the form of a hospital order. Moreover, the practice of punishment presupposes the very responsibility that the legally insane lack. Therefore, as none of the purposes behind punishment can be legitimately applied to the person who was judged to be insane at the time of committing the offence, exculpation should follow. Hospitalisation presupposes responsibility for the offence and brings with it the stigma of guilt.

For the past 45 years or so Mr. Hay Gordon has, in effect, had to live with the stigma of guilt. It is a matter of evidence and a matter of judgment whether he committed the act—of killing the young Miss Curran—in the 1950s. It is also a matter of evidence and a matter of judgment whether, if he did so, he was deficient in mental capacity when he committed the offence.

Mr. Forth: I wish to be clear in my mind, which will help me in my contribution if am able to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. and learned Friend is not saying, is he, that we can or should make any presumption about the innocence or guilt of any individual? I would not expect my hon. and learned Friend to make any sort of assumption. As I understand it, any individual, including the one named, has gone through due process and regrettably—it may not be the position in the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon—is presumed to be guilty until due process demonstrates otherwise. Surely my hon. and learned Friend is not basing his case in any way on any presumption that there has been some sort of miscarriage of justice.

Mr. Garnier: My right hon. Friend is partly right. He is right not to assume that I am making a presumption. Instead, I am advancing an argument. I hope that it is one that commends itself to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South. It is my belief that Mr. Iain Hay Gordon is being denied access to justice. Those who post-1964 or 1965 who—I use the language loosely—committed the act but were insane at the time have access to the Court of Appeal criminal division. Now, since the passing of legislation under the Conservative Government, they have access to the Criminal Cases Review Commission. However, the defendant in the Northern Ireland case does not.

It seems unjust and unfair that as a result of a legislative error in 1964, Mr. Iain Hay Gordon, who I understand is in his early 70s—

Mr. Maclean: He is 66.

Mr. Garnier: I think that he was about 21 at the time. He has had to live right through to the end of the century believing in any event that he was innocent of the crime. On top of that, he has had to bear the baggage of being publicly considered to have been insane. It is bad enough to be unfairly convicted of a criminal offence as serious as murder. To be excused for what he did because he is said by the courts to have been insane must be doubly anxious-making. On top of that, this poor man has been denied access to appeal proceedings, simply because the 1964 legislation did not contain about half a dozen words.

In my view—my right hon. Friend may take an entirely different view for legitimate reasons that he may expound to the House—and from where I stand, I do not consider what has happened to be right, and I want to do something to correct the position.

Mr. Forth: My hon. and learned Friend has referred to the stigma of insanity. Surely we cannot have it both ways. If we assume—I may wish to challenge this if I am given the opportunity to do so—that insanity is an exculpatory or mitigating factor, which I have always had doubt about, and in a peculiar way the accused receives the benefit of that, which in the days of capital punishment would have been a benefit, very dramatically, can we at the same time regard insanity as a stigma? After all, it has been used as a reason for not blaming somebody. Is my hon. and learned Friend in any way trying to have it both ways?

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The purpose of the Bill is to put right an unintentional fault in the law. It has nothing to do with whether my constituent, Iain Hay Gordon, was guilty of the offence or whether he has or has not been insane at any time. The Bill will put right a fault in the law, and that is what we are trying to do. I look forward to our doing it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We cannot have a general debate about insanity. However, the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon has been referred to in the explanatory notes and the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) is able to rebut or support the intervention of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth).

Mr. Garnier: I can well understand the frustration of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe). As she says, Iain Hay Gordon is one of her constituents, and I would think that the Bill is supported by the vast majority of hon. Members. It has been supported by all parties and by the retired Law Lord, Lord Ackner, in the other place. I know exactly where the hon. Lady is coming from. I entirely sympathise with the sense of frustration that I detect across the Chamber.

Mr. Forth: On that point, will my hon. and learned Friend—

Mr. Garnier: No. I would be most grateful to my right hon. Friend if he were a little patient. I want to deal with his point about stigma. I hope that my dealing with it will assist us in our deliberations and persuade those who are reluctant to give the Bill a fair passage that there are good grounds for taking a different view.

I do not want to go into general emotions or whether it is a proper matter for sympathy if someone is declared to be insane in respect of a criminal act. That is not my case. There are many things in this life that bring with them no moral opprobrium.

Let us assume that a woman is falsely accused of having been raped. Rape is a hideous crime and the woman can bear no blame. Yet if a woman is falsely accused of being the victim of rape, it is none the less defamatory. I have only to remind my right hon. Friend of the famous libel case in the 1920s of Princess Yusupov against MGM, in which the widow of the young Russian prince, who was falsely portrayed in a film about Rasputin as being defiled by him, recovered what in those days was a huge sum in damages.

If a constituent of the hon. Member for Maryhill, who is the human reason for the Bill, has been falsely accused of being insane and falsely accused of being responsible for the killing of Miss Curran, that is a stigma which he is entitled to see removed. If the Bill gives him access to the Criminal Cases Review Commission and to the Court of Appeal as a consequence of a referral by the commission, that seems a good end and one that the House should applaud. Indeed, it should seek to do everything in its power to bring about that end.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, South expressed a few misgivings about the speed with which the commission has been able to deal with cases. He mentioned a backlog. I know that the commission, in its submissions to the Home Affairs Committee, of which the hon. Gentleman is the Chairman, said that it needed a great deal more resources and more caseworkers so that it might speed up the work in which it is engaged. I think that it put in a bid to the Home Secretary for an extra £1.3 million. I understand that the Home Secretary scaled that down to about a third of a million pounds. I may be wrong about that, and the Minister or the hon. Gentleman may be able to correct me.

Mr. Mullin: After representations from a number of people, including me, the commission received a large part of what it was asking for. It is in the process of recruiting many extra caseworkers. It may not have everything that it wants but it should be able to make considerable process in reducing the backlog.

Mr. Garnier: I am pleased to hear that. The cases that will benefit from the Bill becoming law must be very few in number. There will not, therefore, be a long queue, at least in this discrete area of cases that may or may not need to be referred. Perhaps the Minister will be able to tell us. I apologised to the hon. Lady privately because I may not be present when she replies, if she is to do so, because of a constituency engagement in Leicestershire—quite near Gartree prison, as it happens—at midday. I apologise to her, to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House if I am not in my place to hear the concluding remarks.

The additional money and caseworkers of which the hon. Member for Sunderland, South has spoken will be vital, but the requirement will not be much added to by the Bill. If my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst has so far heard only of the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon, and if he is complaining about these matters, he has little to worry about.

As at the end of April 1999, as I understand it, the Criminal Cases Review Commission had 444 cases under active review, but it still had 1,176 cases awaiting review. That is a bad set of figures. I hope that, with the Minister's agreement, the money to which the hon. Member for Sunderland, South, the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, referred will assist the commission in dealing with the backlog.

I am told that at the end of December 1998, the length of time that an applicant had to wait for a detailed review of his or her case averaged two years. Mr. Hay Gordon has been waiting since 1952 or 1953. 1952 was the year in which I was born—forty-six and a half years ago. If I were Mr. Hay Gordon, I would be the first to approach my constituency Member of Parliament and invite him or her to press for the Bill. I am delighted that the noble Lord Ackner in the other place was quick to take up that cause.

The House has a history of passing some legislation as a result of a knee-jerk reaction. I shall not list the Bills that the present Government or the Government whom I supported passed in response to press campaigns and single-issue pressure groups. There have been some good Bills that may seem to benefit only one individual. This is one such Bill. Whereas the other place allowed it to be properly considered, with all-party agreement, I trust that the House—

Mr. Maclean: I hate to correct someone as distinguished as my hon. and learned Friend, but the 15 or 20 minutes discussion in the other place was not quite full consideration. It behoves us today to give the Bill more time than that, as we are dealing with a crucial issue of justice relating to a human being. That is no criticism of the other place, which came to the correct conclusion in passing the Bill to us. We need to consider it properly.

Mr. Garnier: My right hon. Friend has his views on the matter, which he must defend if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

On the question of time, I am bearing in mind the forty-six and a half years that Mr. Hay Gordon has awaited the opportunity to go before some form of appellate jurisdiction. I am bearing in mind, too, the other cases, about which we may not know, of people who were convicted of being guilty but insane between the end of the second world war and the enactment of the mid-1960s legislation. I am bearing in mind the ease with which Parliament, which is sovereign, should be able to pass a relatively self-explanatory, humane and civilised Bill.

I do not want to provoke my right hon. and hon. Friends into taking up more of the time of the House by intervening on me. I urge them to consider carefully what we are about, and the advice that we have received not only from the hon. Member for Sunderland, South, the Chairman of the Home Affairs Committee, but from the distinguished and learned Law Lord, now retired, Lord Ackner.

My right hon. and hon. Friends should consider also the words of our noble Friend Lord Taylor of Warwick, a barrister of some experience in the criminal courts, and of the noble Lord Thomas of Gresford, who has considerable experience both as a solicitor and as a barrister practising in the criminal courts. His remarks in the other place are particularly instructive. I trust that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who looks a little puzzled, will study them carefully. There were other speeches there from a layman, our noble Friend the Earl of Portsmouth, who has followed the issue with considerable care.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who is still looking puzzled, may not be a regular reader of The Guardian. I used to work for it; I declare an interest in that respect. My right hon. Friend will find that the issue is not just a lawyers' ramp. It is not just a matter of some half-baked single-issue pressure group getting up and grabbing hold of parliamentary time and legislative power. This is a properly thought-out Bill which requires to be passed into law, and it commends itself to all hon. Members, regardless of their party allegiance.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for indulging me yet again. He is seeking to impress the House with a litany of very important people, and telling us that they think that this is a good Bill. If the matter is as important as my hon. and learned Friend has so eloquently argued, and if it has the support of so many eminent people, why has it taken to long to get here?

Mr. Garnier: My right hon. Friend has been in government. He knows that every Government will have one excuse or another for not finding it convenient to introduce a particular piece of legislation. If something needs to be done, a Government will find time for it to be done. If something does not need to be done, I have found, amazingly, that Governments will find good reasons for it not to be done.

Mr. Forth: Fox hunting.

Mr. Garnier: My right hon. Friend should not draw me on that—especially as I am about to head off for Leicestershire—or I shall be here for a good while yet.

It will be easy for my right hon. Friend, a man of huge Government experience in at least three Departments, to stand up in due course and explain why the Bill should not be given assistance by the Government. It is a private Member's Bill, but it has been given the assistance of Government—or at least, for once, a Government are not hindering a private Member's Bill. If that is the case, it will only add to the feelings of high esteem which I have for the Minister, my London Member of Parliament.

I hope that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South gets his Bill through this afternoon, and I hope that the hon. Member for Maryhill sees her constituent going into the offices of the Criminal Cases Review Commission and to the Court of Appeal and achieving justice. Whichever way that may mean the dice roll, I want him to achieve justice, and I want the hon. Lady to see him achieve justice.

10.8 am

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): As I mentioned earlier, Iain Hay Gordon is my constituent. His fight to clear his name has been going on for an extremely long time. That is most unfortunate, especially as he does not keep in very good health. He has been desperate to move matters forward so that he can try to clear his name, because he is afraid of going to his death without having managed to do so. That cannot be attempted until the Bill is passed.

The Bill seems to have the support of the entire House. It passed through the other place without difficulty. We are speaking of a minor amendment which arises because of an earlier error. It is clear that for the sake of justice and right, the Bill should go through today.

Having waited so long for Parliament to do what is right, we have a chance today to put right a grave wrong to my constituent. He will be extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and to those who have taken up the matter in another place.

The Criminal Cases Review Commission has been in correspondence with me. I know that a large number of other cases are awaiting its attention, but I, too, appeal to the commission to get on with my constituent's case once we pass the Bill today, because of his age and the fact that he has had this hanging over his head for so many years. Today the House has a chance to unite and do the right thing. Let us get on and do it.

10.9 am

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid–Worcestershire): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), the Bill's promoter, and to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe), for the way in which she has come to this House on a Friday to defend the rights of her constituent. I have a great deal of sympathy with what has been said and I was intrigued to hear my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), a distinguished Queen's counsel, setting out his thoughts in detail.

Nothing that I will say this morning signals a lack of support for the Bill, and my instinct is that it should pass. However, I am nervous about the lack of scrutiny that the Bill has received. In total, the report of its scrutiny in another place covered five columns of the Official Report of the proceedings on 23 March. No amendments were made and there was no further debate on Report there. The Bill came here and went through on the nod at the end of a Friday. There was no Committee stage—it was taken at the same time on the Floor of the House.

This morning is the first opportunity that the House has had to discuss the implications of the Bill. Therefore, my remarks on Third Reading might be longer than would normally be my practice. It is important that measures of this kind are properly tested, particularly when the House has had no opportunity to do so before. If we look at the Table, we see all the Bills lined up for consideration today. I have lost count of how many there are.

Mr. Forth: Too many.

Mr. Luff: My right hon. Friend may be right, although I do not have quite the antipathy towards legislation that he has.

Mr. Forth: Nobody does.

Mr. Luff: That is probably true. His antipathy comes from deeply held principles, which Labour Members may not understand. Those of us who have had the pleasure of sharing the Tea Room with him, will know how deep seated is his opposition to legislation. I do not have that opposition to legislation, but a Bill such as this deserves close scrutiny.

In the previous Parliament—for reasons that I perhaps should not discuss—I was invited to reflect at length in Committee on a one-clause Bill. It was a harmless, one-clause Bill, and the Clerks had suggested that no amendment was possible to it. I spent some time studying the Bill and developed a series of amendments, as a result of which the Minister clarified the law in a number of important areas. The lawyers and interest groups that I had consulted expressed their deep gratitude to me for clarifying the law. Even the most harmless and innocuous

[Mr. Luff]

Bill always gains from proper scrutiny. The House should be nervous of even the best-intentioned Bill being enacted without scrutiny.

Mr. Maclean: Is not another obligation placed on us this morning? We are to pass a Bill that nearly everyone says deals with one specific case—although, theoretically, there could be more. In such cases, we must be careful that we are getting the measure right.

Mr. Luff: Obviously, my right hon. Friend can read my mind. The very next point that I intended to make was that, as I read the Bill's proceedings in another place and the background information, one phrase kept recurring in my mind—hard cases make bad law. That is one of oldest saws in considering legislation.

I have no doubt that the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon is a desperately hard case, but this House must not rush—in a fit of perfectly understandable moral eagerness—to put right that case without being sure that we are not doing other injustices in the process. We must be clear about the implications for the bodies affected by the Bill. The Criminal Cases Review Commission lies at the heart of the debate.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend said that we must be careful that the Bill does not produce an injustice in another case. What sort of injustice does he envisage?

Mr. Luff: My hon. and learned Friend invites me to anticipate remarks that I want to make later. In essence, I am asking whether the case that we are discussing is the only one. We have had assurances that it is. How many cases like it might there be in the system?

Mr. Forth: I am certain that I heard the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) say that he thought there might be a few more cases. That is an important point for us all to bear in mind. I agree that if we were dealing with only one case, it would be worrying. There may be more cases, and that leads to the concern about the effect that the Bill might have on other cases—even though we do not know what they are. I hope that that is helpful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Luff: It is genuinely helpful and that is an extremely important point. Exactly how many cases will be caught by the Bill? That is the injustice that I fear. Understandably, the hon. Member for Sunderland, South expressed the hope that the Criminal Cases Review Commission would give the case priority once the Bill had been enacted. However, the work load of the commission is increasing rapidly and to give this case priority over others—whose merit we simply cannot know—is a matter of concern to me. We are imposing a potentially heavy burden on the commission.

Mr. Mullin: No one is trying to impose a heavy burden on the Criminal Cases Review Commission. The commission wants the power to be able to deal with the matter and will decide the priority to be given to the case—not us. It will still be up to the commission. All that we can do is urge the commission to get on with it, on the grounds that the case has been around for 46 years.

Mr. Luff: The hon. Gentleman is right and I have no wish to argue on that point. The House has had his assurance that that is the case. How are we to know, however, that this case is the only one? Are there other similar inadequacies—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are on Third Reading and we should be discussing what is in the Bill. Perhaps these remarks should have been made in Committee or on Second Reading.

Mr. Luff: With the greatest of respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there was no Second Reading and no Committee. That is precisely the problem and that is why we must look at the Bill in a little more detail on Third Reading than would normally be the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point that there was no Committee, but that is no fault of mine. I am guided by the rules of the House, which are clear. Third Reading is a narrow debate, based on what is in the Bill. What might crop up as a result of the Bill is another matter.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Without wishing to challenge your ruling, you have the discretion to bear in mind that, through an act of good will, the House has rushed the Bill on its way to this stage. However, this is the only opportunity that the House has had to consider the Bill in any detail. Therefore, will you use your discretion and wisdom in allowing more of a debate than might otherwise be the case?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that I always use my wisdom in matters relating to him. I am not saying that we cannot have a debate—far from it. However, the rules of the House tell me that the debate must be confined to what is in the Bill. If the rules of the House change, I—as the custodian of the rules—will look after them. At the moment, however, we must confine ourselves to the rules of the House.

Mr. Luff: You are an effective guardian of the rules of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps I have been too generous in giving way to colleagues, which has led me down some alleys of which you may not approve. I will now try to return to my notes, which refer directly to what is in the Bill.

The Criminal Cases Review Commission is included in the Bill. Its task is to examine each case impartially and decide whether it would have a real possibility of succeeding if it were given a further hearing in an appeal court. On the basis of what we have heard about the case of Mr. Hay Gordon, there seems to be every chance that it would have a realistic chance of success. I have no doubt that what the hon. Member for Sunderland, South said about the wishes of the commission was accurate.

Helpfully, the Select Committee on Home Affairs—of which the hon. Member for Sunderland, South is the Chairman—has produced a report on the work of the Criminal Cases Review Commission. The report makes a number of recommendations, one of which refers directly to the Bill. As the Chairman of a Select Committee—I see in the Chamber the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, whom we seek to hold to account—I know there is always a temptation for a Committee to have it both ways and to wish contradictory things.

To an extent, I see that in the first report of the Select Committee on the work of the Criminal Cases Review Commission, which discusses at length the problems of the commission in prioritising its work and the pressure on its resources. Recommendation 6 states:

"We accept and support the basic principle that priority is generally given to applications from those in custody."

The case from which the Bill arises involves a gentleman who is not in custody. Mercifully, if the case has been mishandled, he is at liberty, albeit with the stain on his character described by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough. We have to ask whether it is right to pass the Bill, given the Select Committee's wise view that priority should go to those who are in custody and therefore still suffering the wrong of some miscarriage of justice.

The resources available to the CCRC lie at the heart of our consideration today. I freely admit that, until the hon. Member for Sunderland, South intervened, I was not aware that its resources had been increased. It would be extremely helpful to the House in respect of how it should approach its consideration of the Bill if the Minister told us exactly what resources are available to the commission. The notes on clauses—which have been prepared by the Home Office, not by the hon. Gentleman—show how important that consideration is. They tell us:

"Expenditure on reviewing such cases would have to be found within the planned funding of the Commission. Any expenditure elsewhere in the criminal justice system resulting from an application to the Commission under the Bill, or from a decision by the Commission to refer a verdict of guilty but insane to the Court of Appeal, would similarly have to be found within current planned provision."

We have to satisfy ourselves that the case in question, which goes back more than 46 years, is a one-off. Typically, the cases that will be brought before the commission will date back over such a period. Re-examining them at such a late stage would be particularly labour intensive. I am always reluctant to reopen cases of such antiquity. After nearly half a century, it is difficult to go through the background and the evidence to understand the circumstances with clarity. It would clearly be a time-consuming business.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that not only does that matter have resource implications—that important point may have to be developed—but the relevant material, witnesses, evidence and so on will necessarily be that much less reliable, given the age of the cases? Is not that a factor that we shall all have to bear in mind as we consider the efficacy of the Bill?

Mr. Luff: Characteristically, my right hon. Friend makes a point that I was seeking to make rather better than I would have done. He is right and that is one of the central challenges for the House during its consideration of the Bill. The Minister must satisfy us that the case in question is one of only a very small group. Is her estimate of the number of cases three or four, which was the estimate made by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South when he opened his remarks? If her estimate is 10, 12 or 15, the nature of our consideration would have to change and a much sharper problem would be posed for the CCRC.

Mr. Mullin: I do not want to prolong this agony. I did not say that I knew of three or four cases; I said that I knew of one and that I had heard someone say that there might be two. It is very unlikely that there will be as many as three or four and it is perfectly possible that the case in question will be the only one. The hon. Gentleman talked about assurances that I have given. The assurances that I have given on miscarriages of justice over the years have largely proved reliable.

Mr. Luff: With characteristic modesty, the hon. Gentleman sets out for the House his track record on these matters; I think he has a great deal about which to be modest. He has a good reputation on these issues and I congratulate him on it, but the Bill has not been scrutinised thoroughly elsewhere, so we need to know what assessment the Government have made of the likely work load on the commission that will flow from the Bill. I am told that the commission is adamant that it will not sacrifice thoroughness for the sake of speed. It is right to take that view, but I fear that achieving thoroughness in such a case could be particularly demanding.

In November 1998, the Home Secretary rejected the bid for £1.3 million additional funding. We are told that additional money has been forthcoming, although my information was that the only money available was for information technology. It appears that, as well as capital funding, revenue funding will be available for additional caseworkers. That is good, because the commission is clearly doing important work. I would certainly want my constituents to have access to it in cases of miscarriage of justice. However, the statistics are quite alarming and it is important that the House is aware of them.

I think that my most recent information comes from a memorandum to the Home Affairs Committee from the CCRC; if that is not the case, I apologise to the House. The backlog of more than 1,000 cases is growing at a rate of more than one a day and, by definition, the cases that the commission consider[illegible] serious. The backlog is huge and each and every [illegible] is a matter of considerable concern to the individual affected by it. Standing here in the Chamber today, I have no way of prioritising the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon over those other 1,000 cases.

In its evidence to the Home Affairs Committee last December, the CCRC said:

"The October 1997 memorandum to the Committee noted the very severe problems that had been posed by the CCRC's initial caseload, but hoped that the case completion rate might soon reach the case intake rate."

In other words, the commission's waiting list—to use a topical term from another area of the public policy debate—is growing steadily. The CCRC went on to say that the

"CCRC casework experience to date, and caseflow analysis, combine to demonstrate clearly that the CCRC cannot achieve casework breakeven, and minimise the case accumulation, on any reasonable timescale unless substantially increased resources are allocated to it."

Mrs. Fyfe: The hon. Gentleman has already been advised that it is not our business to offer the CCRC any order of priority for its work. We are here merely to pass a necessary amendment to the Bill arising from an error that was made at an earlier stage. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Luff: I admire the way in which the hon. Lady is fighting for the interests of her constituent. I want to be persuaded that the Bill should be enacted because her constituent should have the justice that he is lacking and hear what she says, but the message sent out at the end of his speech by the hon. Member for Sunderland, South was that the commission should give that case priority. The nature of the case suggests to me that he may be right—I do not know enough about the cases before the CCRC to reach that judgment—but if similar cases arose, we would logically have to support the commission giving them priority over other cases, which may be of great importance.

Mr. Maclean: Surely there is another valid point. We are being asked to pass the Bill using a slightly expedited procedure. There has been no debate on Second Reading. The CCRC may not be able to consider the case for three years—when it has cleared its existing backlog—which is an argument for suggesting that the Bill's provisions could be part of a Government Bill next year. We would then have more time to consider such a Bill clause by clause.

Mr. Luff: I hear what my right hon. Friend says, but I do not share that view, although I understand why he has expressed it. I want the Minister to give a clear explanation of why my fears are misplaced. The House would then be able to give the Bill speedy passage, rather than delaying it unnecessarily. I am sure that the hon. Member for Maryhill does not want her constituent to wait another year, even for the opportunity to put his case to the commission. Subject to the assurances that we receive from the Minister, I hope that we can give the Bill speedy progress, but it is important that we understand the extent of the problems that the commission faces as we do that.

On 16 December 1998, The Guardian said:

"MPs who fear a repeat of the Child Support Agency shambles are to summon Home Office Ministers to explain why they refused a plea for an extra £1.3 million for the Criminal Cases Review Commission to attack the mounting backlog."

I do not know whether those words are a briefing from a member of the Home Affairs Committee or the florid prose of The Guardian, but this is clearly a matter of considerable concern to the Committee and it is right to be concerned.

The Bill centres on the Iain Hay Gordon case. We are informed that his may be one of two, three, four, or however many cases, and we have already debated that matter. I have looked at the background to the case and I understand why the hon. Member for Maryhill is so concerned about it. I shall not weary the House with an account of it, because that would clearly be an inappropriate use of our time. I was, however, slightly amused by an article in The Herald of 27 April last year, which states:

"A political row is brewing over the refusal of the Criminal Cases Review Commission to begin an investigation into an alleged miscarriage in the case of Glasgow man Iain Gordon, 66 . . . Mr. Chris Mullin, the veteran campaigner against injustice and chairman of the Commons Home Affairs Select Committee, has written to commission chairman Sir Frederick Crawford to demand an explanation for the commission's handling of the case . . . Mr. Mullin, Labour MP for Sunderland South, called for Sir Frederick's resignation when it was revealed last August that the £88,000-a-year chairman of the new body was a freemason in the Gordon case. Mr. Mullin has accused him of appearing to have taken 'a narrow view of your responsibilities and one that is certainly at odds with the intention of Parliament when the commission was established'."

Mr. Mullin: I cannot be responsible for what is in The Herald, but I certainly did not call for Sir Frederick's resignation. I did, at the time of his appointment, express surprise that a Birmingham freemason had been put in charge of this particularly sensitive commission, but Sir Frederick has done a pretty good job during his two years in office and I have no complaint about him.

Mr. Luff: I am not and have never been a freemason, but I am suspicious of the hon. Gentleman's suspicion of freemasons. I was, however, delighted to hear his tribute to Sir Frederick and I am sure that he will be pleased as well. A degree of guilt probably lingers in the hon. Gentleman's mind. It is excellent that he has sought to expunge it by presenting the Bill and recognising that the commission was not guilty of failing to do its duty, but simply did not have the statutory ability to perform that duty.

Let me return to the fundamental point. The Iain Hay Gordon case provides us with a useful example, but we should take it only as an illustration. We should not see it as our reason for acting; we must act on principle. The question of whether Iain Hay Gordon was or was not the victim of a miscarriage of justice is not for the House to consider. It is a matter for the due process that will follow if the Bill is passed. The question that we should consider is the question of access to the powers of the commission. I believe that the House should grant such access only if it is absolutely clear that an intolerable burden will not be placed on the commission.

Is this a single case? Single cases are regularly used to shape law in this place, but I feel that they should be used only to illustrate it. Another question—one that the Minister should answer—is this: what precedent are we setting if we pass the Bill? Are there other lacunae in the wording of the legislation that established the Criminal Cases Review Commission? Are there other issues that need to be addressed? Will passing the Bill give rise to a raft of private Members' Bills dealing with other inadequacies, or is this, as it were, a one-off case of a one-off case?

Mr. Maclean: Nearly everyone who has spoken today has said that the failure to include the terminology "guilty but insane" was clearly due to a drafting error. I have heard no evidence so far that that is so. Perhaps the omission was a deliberate act on the part of the draftsmen or the Ministers responsible. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us that it was a technical error and not a deliberate act on the part of this Parliament.

Mr. Luff: My right hon. Friend leads me neatly to my next and—the House will be relieved to hear—final point, which concerns retrospectivity. This is retrospective legislation. Just as hard cases make bad law and the House must be suspicious of them, retrospective cases often cause difficulty, for precisely the reasons that my right hon. Friend has just given. What was in the mind of Parliament when the legislation was passed? Was what it did intentional or unintentional?

Thornton's "Legislative Drafting" defines retrospectivity thus:

"It is desirable that wherever possible a statute should indicate in express and unmistakable terms whether (and, if so, how far) or not it is intended to be retrospective . . . Retrospective laws offend against the general principle that legislation intended to regulate human conduct ought to deal with future acts and ought not to change the character of past transactions carried upon the faith of existing law".

I know that the Home Secretary shares that view. Almost exactly 13 years ago, during a debate on the Rate Support Grant Bill, the right hon. Gentleman—then an Opposition Member—said:

"The Government have become slap happy in the use of retrospective legislation."—[Official Report, 23 June 1986; Vol. 100, c. 86.]

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) said, it must be clear that we are simply correcting an innocent drafting error, and that there is no matter of substance behind the omission that is identified by the Iain Hay Gordon case.

I expect the Bill to be given a Third Reading today. I suspect that the mood of the House is in favour of it, subject to the assurances that the Minister can give. Notwithstanding what the hon. Member for Sunderland, South said, however, the commission must set priorities for itself. However indignant hon. Members may feel about individual cases, it is for the commission to make the difficult judgments about how it should use its still limited resources in the face of a mounting case load.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I shall continue in the spirit of the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff). A number of points deserve our consideration, given the rather unusual route by which the Bill has reached this stage. If anything, it is even more incumbent on us than it might otherwise be to ensure that we are satisfied about those points before allowing it to proceed. Because it has come from the other place, this is the last opportunity for it to be scrutinised in a considered way and in detail, and for us to discharge our responsibility as one of the Houses of Parliament.

The Bill was considered briefly in the other place. That is no criticism—far be it for me to criticise the methods adopted in another place—but I think it fair to say that the consideration was fairly brief. I think that it is also fair to say that, even at this early stage, a number of important points have emerged. It may have surprised hon. Members that what at first blush appeared to be a Bill of modest scope is already raising significant issues of principle, and I think it incumbent on us to satisfy ourselves about those before we proceed too much further.

One of those points, which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire touched on, has bothered me considerably. I refer to the vexed question of whether it is legitimate or desirable to legislate on the basis of one known case, or even a very limited number of known cases. It is an age-old question, which has confronted us as a legislature many times over a long period; but that does not diminished its importance. What we are really saying is that, if we are worried about a single case and the existing law does not cover that case adequately, we should—as the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) put it, eloquently and, he thought, persuasively—move as quickly as possible to change the law in order to acknowledge the problem.

That is, in a sense, self-evident, as far as it goes. The danger is that, in some instances, changing the law to deal with one case could put at risk the principles of justice, access to justice and the balance of justice in other cases. We must satisfy ourselves beyond reasonable doubt that that will not happen.

Mr. Maclean: Is my right hon. Friend slightly mystified by the fact that the other place was keen for the Bill to proceed quickly, although it twice rejected a similarly retrospective measure involving only one or two individuals—the war crimes legislation? We had to pass it by means of the Parliament Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We should not start discussing other legislation.

Mr. Maclean: I was not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was under the impression that the right hon. Gentleman was. I apologise. Let me, however, reinforce my ruling that we are not going to go into other legislation.

Mr. Forth: And I shall not answer my right hon. Friend's retrospectivity point now, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall deal with it in a moment. Looking at my notes, I find that that formed the second of the points that I wish to cover in my brief contribution, but I want to do justice to the earlier point that I was making. I do not want to weary the House with it, but it is important. I shall answer myself, in a sense, and therefore satisfy, I hope, other Members.

The question I pose is whether it is legitimate or desirable to make a change in the law based on a single known case. To my surprise, when the question was posed to the Library, we got back a considerable list of such cases. I shall not weary the House with the entire list; a few examples will suffice.

The one that all colleagues will remember with affection is the Peerage Act 1963, which arose from the battle of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) to ensure that he was able to renounce his peerage and take his elected place in the House. That is one obvious case. I skip through some of the others. The law was changed in the Grant v. Borg case, which involved overstaying immigrants; after the House of Lords judgment in the Regina v. Preddy case, which involved mortgage fraud and acquiring credit by deception; and in the Thai Trading Company v. Taylor, case, which involved conditional fees.

I make that point only to dispel any doubts that colleagues may have about the respectability, if I may put it that way, of basing a change in the law on one single known case. Therefore, in that sense, I am persuaded, but there is a lingering doubt, which we should bear in mind before we finally dispose of the Bill: that there is no likely risk of the change proposed in the Bill having an adverse effect on our judicial system, access to justice or the probability of justice being done.

[Mr. Forth]

Given the particular circumstances of the Bill, its thrust and content, that risk is minimal, or probably zero—of that I am fairly satisfied. Given our duty and responsibility in such cases to consider whether there is a danger or risk, I am satisfied. I mentioned only a few of the precedents because I did not want to weary the House.

Mr. Maclean: I think that my right hon. Friend could be in danger of inadvertently misleading himself, not that he would ever mislead the House. I have studied the precedents, too. Some of the cases that he has mentioned have not resulted in specific legislation, Bills or Acts, but have merely hastened Governments to make amending clauses in other legislation that is going through the House. That happened with the Access to Justice Bill after the R.V. Khan case; it speeded up Government legislation. However, there are very few cases—I am familiar only with the Viscount Stansgate case—of an Act of Parliament being introduced for an individual.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We would extend the debate if we went into those matters.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have let me off the hook. When I am under scrutiny from my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), I am always grateful for any escape route that is offered to me, which I gratefully accept. That brings me readily to the next point that I wanted to cover: retrospectivity. Again, one has to be careful, but there is a duty on us to consider how far one is entitled, or is under a duty, to seek to go back in terms of legislation.

Throughout my studies at university, as far as I can remember them now, and even on coming to the House, I was told that we did not legislate retrospectively here. That was my firmly held view. I clung to that. I thought it an important principle until I got here. Then I found, as one does with many things—I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members will share the experience—that those things that we thought were established, nay, almost sacred principles of the House of Commons and, indeed, of our unwritten constitution, were nothing of the kind, and that we live in a flexible and fluid world at Westminster.

So even the principle of retrospectivity, which I thought was the foundation stone of our constitution, unwritten as it is, is not quite what it seems. The principle that overrides even that one is pragmatism. The other, which I think is still the case, although even that is in doubt now, is that no one Parliament can bind another.

An interesting issue is raised by the constitutional changes that have just been made. There is a question as to whether—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman will push the boat out a bit too far if he goes into constitutional matters. It is a Third Reading debate on the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful. I was getting a bit carried away with my argument about retrospection. I had better limit it, as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, rightly point out, to the Bill itself.

Again, there are precedents. At the risk of provoking my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border again, I asked for examples of retrospective legislation. I have a list, but I am now quite nervous about quoting from it in case he picks me up on it. Suffice it to say that the research that I have commissioned suggests that it is permissible, and there are precedents for a retrospective approach when it is deemed justifiable.

The promoter of the Bill said in his admirable speech that, in a sense, that was the whole justification for the Bill. It is based on, we think, a single case. We are not sure; there may be a few others. In a sense, the whole point of the Bill is to look back, to look at the particular circumstances that prevailed at the time, to identify the lacuna, and then to say, "We will now legislate in 1999 for something that happened a very long time ago and for a glitch, or gap in the law, which has only fairly recently emerged, to the disadvantage of one known individual, although there may be others."

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend is correct. There have been numerous examples of retrospective legislation. I had the privilege of studying the list as well, but I could not find any examples relating to individuals. The examples related to teachers' pay and conditions, vaccine-damaged children and London Regional Transport—I could not find one case of retrospective legislation dealing with a single individual.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I keep coming back to it: we must concern ourselves with the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful. That brings me neatly to the issue that was touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire, which I will characterise as antiquity and, therefore, efficacy. He touched on the point in a different way, admittedly.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Before my right hon. Friend moves from the point about retrospection: I have listened to his arguments with interest, as I have to the arguments of other Conservative Members, but I am not really convinced. Surely any matter of law that deals with matters of appeal is, by its very nature, retrospective. In that instance, he cannot hold it against legislation dealing with appeal matters that it is retrospective. Is it not inevitable?

Mr. Forth: That is partly the case, but there is a problem, which I am coming on to; I hope that my hon. Friend will bear with me. Surely, there is one thing that we have to consider, because we are talking about a proper judicial process, not just a quasi-judicial process. One of the factors that it is incumbent on us to consider with great seriousness is the extent to which we think it efficacious and viable to allow a review to take place, when, by definition—we are defining it in this case, or it is defined for us—the material factors will be so far in the distant past as to be possibly unreliable. That is beyond doubt. As the hon. Member for Sunderland, South pointed out, the Bill arose from events a very long time ago.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Is it not for the review to discover whether the facts are uncertain, or too long ago? It surely should not be denied the opportunity to consider that case.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but I do not think it is as obvious as he suggests. I had the same problem in respect of the war crimes legislation some years ago and I would contend that when one is dealing with events in the distant past, the evidence becomes less reliable. As my hon. Friend points out, there is an element of judgment and we are making precisely that judgment today. In making this proposed change in the law and inviting a review process which inevitably will have to deal with events in the distant past, we must consider how comfortable we are with the likelihood that that will lead to a proper process of justice.

I hope that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South will sum up the debate. I could almost write his speech for him now—or at least part of it. I suspect that he will say that he has been involved in a number of cases that deal with exactly this matter. That might set my mind at rest as it is an important factor.

Another point that I wish to make in my preliminary remarks involves money. I address these comments mainly to the Minister, who I hope will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We look forward to her contribution as it will help to set in context a number of issues that have arisen in the debate, and no doubt will arise again. However, this is a particular matter for the Minister and I am alerting her and any others who may be in a position to assist.

A key element in the debate are the additional responsibilities that the Bill places on the Criminal Cases Review Commission. It has been admitted—rightly, in my view—that the House has no influence on the priority of the work of the CCRC. That is a matter for its judgment. However, knowing a little about these matters, I suspect that the CCRC could possibly be influenced by the Minister. It might even be influenced by reading these proceedings. It is obviously the wish of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) that it should be so influenced. No doubt she has assiduously made her own representations in that regard and I wish her well with them. However, I wish to make a narrow point about money and staff.

My information is that the commission has calculated that it needs something like 60 case review managers in order to process new cases and reduce the backlog. It has been claimed that the Government have given extra money to the CCRC. In February this year the Government announced plans to give the CCRC an extra £1.2 million to employ more caseworkers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a debate about a limited extension of the role of the Criminal Cases Review Commission. It is not a general debate on the work of the commission.

Mr. Forth: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have enabled me to move on to the substance of my remarks, having dealt with the preliminaries. I shall now turn to the Bill itself, and I am sure that you will approve of my doing that. [Interruption.]

Mrs. Fyfe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not know what is amusing some Opposition Members, but I do not share their amusement, given that they are discussing the human rights of a constituent of mine. Perhaps they could be brought to order, or bring themselves to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not, strictly speaking, a matter for the Chair, but I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members will take on board what the hon. Lady has said.

Mr. Forth: With the greatest charity, let me say that if the hon. Lady were here more often on a Friday she would realise that our proceedings are often a little more relaxed and that that often allows us to proceed on a consensual basis. I would regret that consensus and good spirit being interrupted in any way and I hope that the hon. Lady would not be party to that.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): Let me put the mind of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) at rest. Many of us are here today because we share her concern for her constituent. That is why we support the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who reinforces what I said. The way in which the House works on Fridays and deals with private Members' Bills is a little different from the normal run of events, as you know better than almost any of us, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Maclean: I would merely point out that on the last occasion the Bill was before the House and those of us who are always here on Fridays expedited its passage through to this stage, I do not recall the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) being here, worried about her constituent's rights.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having difficulty in persuading hon. Members to speak to the Third Reading of the Bill. We cannot debate who was here last Friday or the previous Friday.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall now get stuck into the Bill itself. I can reassure you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the hon. Member for Maryhill that it will not take long.

My references to the Bill relate to my introductory remarks. Clause 1(1) states that "the Criminal Cases Review Commission may at any time refer the verdict to the Court of Appeal if subsection (2) below applies."

The Bill gives a very wide remit to the CCRC. It is important that we acknowledge that we are broadening the original remit of the commission very widely indeed.

[Mr. Forth]

Another concern on which I would welcome the comments of the Minister or the promoter of the Bill—and probably both—relates to clause 1(2)(b). Subsection (2) states:

"This subsection applies if the Commission consider that there is a real possibility that the verdict would not be upheld were the reference to be made and . . . it appears to the Commission that there are exceptional circumstances which justify the making of the reference."

That is an extremely wide and permissive phrase. It crosses my mind to question whether it is wise to give that degree of latitude. As we all know, exceptional circumstances can be defined in almost any way. There is no limitation and no further reference to that provision. It simply gives the commission the power to make a judgment as to what exceptional circumstances are and links that to its ability to make a reference.

When we give such wide powers, we must be satisfied that there is no possibility that they could be misused. I have no reason to suppose that they would be, but there is always a possibility of that when we give extraordinarily wide powers to what I would—perhaps unfairly—characterise as a bureaucracy.

Mr. Maclean: So far this morning we have been told that on every occasion a simple error of drafting in the original legislation failed to include the terminology "guilty, but insane". This Bill, however, gives the commission powers to refer cases in "exceptional circumstances". We need to know from the Minister whether that provision is widening the existing powers of the commission to deal with other cases that were covered in the Criminal Appeal Act 1995.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. My only regret about today's proceedings is that we have been unable to look a little more widely at the relationship between the parts of the law that deal with guilt and insanity. I should have preferred that, as I have some rather distinctive views on the issue. However, it is probably just as well for me that I am unable today to express those views at great length, as they might be regarded as somewhat eccentric—but then, I am quite used to that.

Nevertheless—under your wise and correct guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker—we are not allowed to range that little bit more widely, which I do regret, although there will perhaps be another occasion on which we are able to do so.

Given that the issue—the whole matter of how far insanity may be regarded as an exculpatory or mitigating factor—has always been such a contentious one in law, and given how much the Bill touches on that issue, it is, in retrospect, perhaps slightly regrettable that we did not have a full-blown Second Reading debate in which we could have ranged across the issue more widely, or detailed consideration in Committee. However, the House made a different judgment on the matter, and I do not want to rake over that.

I can well appreciate—the hon. Member for Maryhill has left us in no doubt about it—the strength of feeling on the matter relating to her constituent and perhaps to one or two other cases. I have been able to satisfy myself on some of the matters that worried me about extrapolating from individual cases and about retrospection.

I have, however, some lingering doubts about the Bill. The key—other than the introductory speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South, which was rather brief—to settling those doubts will be the Minister's reply, and then the final reply to the debate. I hope that those replies will be able to persuade me that my lingering doubts could be dispelled, and that the House should give the Bill our final approval.

Today's debate is the final stage in the Bill's passage, and that is what makes it so important. There will be no going back from our action today or further opportunities to debate the Bill—this is it. If we are to change law in this limited but important way, we must be absolutely satisfied beyond reasonable doubt. I look forward to receiving such satisfaction from the Minister and from the final reply, so that I may join other hon. Members in allowing the Bill to be passed.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): The debate has been useful. Some interesting speeches have dealt with, first, the amount of parliamentary time devoted to this type of legislation; secondly, the historical precedents of single-case legislation; and thirdly, some interesting arguments on retrospective legislation and how the Bill falls into the mould of previous legislation that Parliament has hitherto thought it right and just to pass. I may well have a few more remarks on those issues, but, as they have already been dealt with extensively in the debate, I do not want the main substance of my arguments to dwell on them.

Colleagues have referred to examples of single-case legislation—I shall not weary the House by referring again to them—but each of those examples had a wider application. Although each of those cases had been brought to the House's attention because of a single hard case, in every one in which Parliament thought it right to act not only one individual, but a wider public benefited from that action. The famous case of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) is an obvious example of that. I think that the Minister really has to address that issue when replying to the debate.

I do not claim to be any great expert on precedent in the House—but we may be embarking on a quite unusual step: passing an Act of Parliament on the basis of a single case, benefiting only that individual. I do not think that anyone speaking in the debate so far has been able to allude to other people who are disadvantaged by current law but will benefit from the Bill, if it is passed. The Bill is, therefore, very much an example of single-case legislation helping a single individual. That is an important, even constitutional, point to which Ministers, in supporting the Bill, will have to refer.

The Bill is very clear on its central point. Clause 1 states:

"Where a verdict was returned in England and Wales or Northern Ireland to the effect that a person was guilty of the act or omission charged against him but was insane at the time, the Criminal Cases Review Commission may at any time refer the verdict to the Court of Appeal".

The Bill goes on, in clause 2(2), to state:

"In their application to such a reference by virtue of subsection (1) above, sections 13 and 14 of that Act shall have effect—

(a) as if references to the verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity were to the verdict referred under section 1(1) above".

In passing the Bill, therefore, we shall be saying that the fact that, all those years ago, the jury in the particular case returned a verdict of guilty but insane should now be treated by the courts as if the jury had returned a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. So far, all the arguments that we have heard from the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), and which were adduced in the other place, seem to suggest that there is no difference between those two concepts; they are the same—and that if a jury were considering those matters now, all these years later, it would feel that there was no difference between the two concepts. Before the House passes the Bill, we have to be absolutely convinced that those arguments are true.

There has been much learned debate on the nature of insanity, a matter that has exercised profound legal experts. From my reading of the issues surrounding the specific case, however, there has been no fixed outcome of that learned debate, or definite conclusion on the nature of insanity as it applies to criminal cases. An article by R. D. MacKay, for example, entitled "Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law", states:

"Perhaps more than any other area of the criminal law, the insanity defence generates heated discussion and debate. The literature discussing the insanity plea is immense, and reform proposals are continuously formulated. In short, there is an ongoing debate about whether the law should recognise that some crazy people ought not to be punished for behaviour which would normally be adjudged criminal. This debate, which tends to ebb and flow in the light of notorious cases, is one which deserves to be within the public domain since the underlying question of whether it is appropriate to excuse a mentally abnormal offender is a question with fundamental moral and social implications."

That is indeed true. If we were to pass the Bill, we should perhaps be entering into a new sphere of the debate on criminal insanity.

Those matters were considered quite fully in the report of the royal commission on capital punishment, which reported between 1949 and 1953, Cmnd. 8932. The commission found that only those who have the capacity to act rationally should be held accountable for criminal acts, and that an individual's capacity is sometimes interfered with because of mental illness, which may in turn mean that his behaviour can no longer be viewed as rational. The difficulty is in deciding at which stage such a conclusion may be reached.

I should like, in general terms, to deal with the debate in the other place. We have been enormously helped, as we often are in debates that refer to detailed aspects of the criminal law, by the remarks of the Lords of Appeal, who bring a great deal of knowledge to these matters. Their Lordships have reminded us that the jury in the 1953 case returned a special verdict, under the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883, that the defendant was guilty but insane.

Sir Louis Blom-Cooper, acting on behalf of Mr. Hay Gordon—without going into too much detail, this was a case before the Court of Appeal claiming that there had clearly been a drafting error and that Parliament, in enacting subsequent legislation, must have believed that the two states of mind were the same—said that Parliament, in enacting the words of section 10(6) of the 1995 Act, intended to include the phrase "guilty but insane". Sir Louis's thesis was that the two phrases were interchangeable in essence and intent, and that the change from the first to the second and back again was no more than terminological.

"was not guilty by reason of insanity"

Their lordships seemed to agree with that view. Lord Ackner, who opened the debate in a characteristically forthright and cogent speech, said that this was "a simple error of drafting, but it has created a long-standing and tragic absurdity"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 March 1999; Vol. 598, c. 1255.]

and that it was quite wrong that Mr. Hay Gordon could not have his case investigated. He therefore believed that the law should be changed. As a result, we have this Bill before us.

All that is clear. We are being asked today to consider this matter as a minor drafting Bill. Nobody, however, has gone back to the original case and I am concerned that we are now dealing with matters that happened a long time ago. We are not sitting in a jury at that trial; we cannot see witnesses and judge their evidence. Is it right, therefore, for us to form a judgment? You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may say that we do not have to form a judgment—

Mr. Mullin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Are we supposed to be making a judgment on the Iain Hay Gordon case? That is what the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) appears to be inviting us to do. Will you invite him to return to the subject of the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already ruled that the debate should be narrow and tied to Third Reading. On the summary notes that I received, the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon was mentioned, so I do not mind the case being mentioned, but it should not be discussed at length.

Mr. Leigh: I was deliberately pointing out that we are not equipped to discuss whether Mr. Hay Gordon was innocent or guilty. I was trying to draw the House's attention to a point that is central to the Bill. The jury heard all the evidence and came to the carefully considered view that the defendant was guilty of the offence, but was insane. We must convince ourselves that that is no different from finding a verdict that he was not guilty by reason of insanity.

That raises some interesting issues. Surely the whole point of the insanity defence is that the defendant is incapable of mens rea. He is incapable of having a guilty mind. Therefore, if his counsel comes to court and pleads that he is insane, the jury does not have to consider in detail whether he was guilty of the offence, because that is irrelevant. He was incapable of having a guilty mind, and all criminal offences—not civil offences—involve the concept of a guilty mind. Once the counsel convinces the judge that the defendant is insane, that is the end of the proceedings.

[Mr. Leigh]

Perhaps Parliament, in its wisdom in 1883, when it devised the original concept of guilty but insane, had before it a third way: the jury could conclude that the defendant had committed the offence—in this case, he had stabbed a young woman about 37 times—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House does not have the authority to re-try a case, especially this morning. We are simply allowing the proper judicial services to do so. We cannot, therefore, concentrate on whether the person in question carried out the acts to which the hon. Gentleman refers. That is for someone else to do.

Mr. Leigh: I was saying that by way of illustration, because I am trying to develop the concept of exactly what Parliament had in mind in 1883 when it introduced the original legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What Parliament had in its mind in 1883 I would not know. What I do know is that we are supposed to be discussing the Third Reading of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman probably heard me rule that we must keep to the narrow content of the Bill. We cannot extend the argument beyond that.

Mr. Leigh: I shall stop dealing with the facts surrounding the 1953 case. I simply suggest that, given all the arguments about the dangers inherent in Parliament introducing retrospective legislation, we should not instantly conclude that we are discussing a mere drafting error. We should conclude that what happened all those years ago was—possibly, we have no idea—in accordance with the facts as the jury understood them. Now, in introducing retrospective legislation, we are reversing the finding of that jury, which had good reason for acting as it did. So long as Parliament is aware of that, that is all right. We must be aware that it is a major step.

Some inflammatory articles have been written in The Guardian and The Scotsman. What has not been pointed out, however, is that the articles were based on the fact that Mr. Hay Gordon was innocent and that, therefore, his family and the judge must have been engaged in a cover-up. That is an appalling smear on the judge, who, presumably, is long since dead. The publicity surrounding this case has been most unfortunate. I wish that, when people promote this sort of legislation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not like to keep intervening on the hon. Gentleman, but he is making it difficult for me. The Bill does not mention the publicity surrounding the Hay Gordon case, so the hon. Gentleman cannot discuss the matter. This is supposed to be a Third Reading debate.

Mr. Leigh: I knew when I made that point that I was straying, but I wanted to get it off my chest because I felt so strongly about it.

Having read very carefully this short Bill and the literature surrounding it, my clear conclusion is that it should become law, because there is a real possibility that an injustice was done all those years ago. It is clear from what their lordships said—they know more about it than we do—that there is no other way of righting the wrong. However, Parliament should be aware that it might be a unique piece of legislation and that there may be perfectly cogent reasons why the jury acted as it did.

We may be introducing retrospective legislation changing the verdict in a single case. That may not matter too much, because we will not make the final decision. We will simply enact the Bill, and the Criminal Cases Review Commission will be able to range widely over all the issues in a way that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have rightly ruled out of order for us today. We must now pass the heavy burden of reopening such old questions, and we should be fully aware of the wide-ranging nature of what we are doing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): I am very grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) for his stewardship of the Bill, and I pay tribute to Lord Ackner, who introduced it in the other place, and to Lord Portsmouth, who has long been active in promoting the change that it will accomplish.

I am grateful, too, for the contributions that we have heard this morning. Even though it is a Friday and we have a large number of Bills to get through, we should remember that the Bill had no Second Reading debate in the House, so there are genuine concerns to be dealt with. I hope that the debate has been useful and that we can alleviate any lingering fears.

The Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 introduced a special verdict that the accused was guilty of the act charged against him, but was insane when he did that act. That verdict is known as guilty but insane. Since 1914, the courts have held that the verdict is technically an acquittal, and thus that there is no right of appeal against it. The Mental Health Act (Northern Ireland) 1961 replaced the special verdict with a finding of not guilty on the ground of insanity.

For England and Wales, the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 amended the 1883 Act so that the special verdict became one of not guilty by reason of insanity. In effect, guilty but insane was merely renamed, with the important addition that a right of appeal was introduced against the new finding and verdict; but that was not applied retrospectively to verdicts of guilty but insane.

Mr. Leigh: Is it the Minister's understanding that when a jury returns a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity, it is saying that the defendant is guilty of carrying out the offence but was insane at the time, or is it refusing to come to a conclusion about whether the defendant is guilty, because it does not matter as he was insane?

Kate Hoey: The crucial thing about the 1964 Act is that it introduced a right of appeal. The Bill is intended to ensure that people who were subject to the verdict before 1964—the one that linked insanity and guilt—can appeal.

The Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland were given a power to refer the new verdict and finding, but not the old verdict of guilty but insane, back to the Court of Appeal. Under the Criminal Appeal Act 1995, enacted by the previous Government, that power was transferred to the Criminal Cases Review Commission without alteration.

The opportunity to make the change that we are now making should really have been taken in 1995. I criticise no one for that. The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) was a Home Office Minister at the time, but he was not personally responsible for the matter, and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South was involved in setting up the commission. We did not take the opportunity simply because no one thought of it. That is why we are trying to enact the Bill now.

Mr. Leigh: With respect, the Minister has not answered my question. I fully understand that if one is found not guilty by reason of insanity or guilty but insane one should have the right of appeal. We are all agreed on that. My question is whether it is the Government's view that the two verdicts are exactly equivalent.

Kate Hoey: I hope that I can help the hon. Gentleman. Precisely the same facts must be found for guilty but insane as for not guilty by reason of insanity.

Mr. Brady: If a verdict of guilty but insane is referred to appeal, could the insane element alone be struck out, leaving the guilty element, or would both parts necessarily be struck out? If an appeal is against not guilty by reason of insanity and the insanity element is struck out, the not guilty element remains. There seems to be a real difference.

Kate Hoey: I am not a lawyer, thank goodness. The Bill is not about such technicalities. If I am advised of a definitive response to the hon. Gentleman's question, I will let him know today. Otherwise, I shall have to write to him.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) said, Mr. Iain Hay Gordon was found guilty but insane in Northern Ireland in 1953 of the murder of 19-year-old Patricia Curran, the daughter of a senior High Court judge. I was a little girl at the time and that terrible murder took place only a few miles from my family home. I remember the enormous amount of publicity and talk, and there was always something unsatisfactory about the case.

Mr. Hay Gordon was committed to a hospital, where he remained until his discharge into the care of his parents in Scotland in 1960. After the trial, a campaign to clear his name began. At the beginning of 1998, an application was made to the Criminal Cases Review Commission to refer the case to the Court of Appeal. In June 1998, the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland ruled that the 1995 Act did not allow the commission to refer the verdict of guilty but insane. Of course, its reasoning would have led to the same conclusion in respect of a verdict returned in England or Wales.

It is precisely because the CCRC had to do some work on the case so as to refer it to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal that the commission already knew something about it. Hon. Members are right to say that the CCRC chooses its priorities for dealing with cases, but, as Mr. Iain Hay Gordon's Member of Parliament has pointed out, presumably the commission will consider the case and reflect on it in the light of its history and special circumstances.

Miss McIntosh: The point that concerns me under the Bill is that it does not clarify sufficiently what level of proof and evidence has to be brought on the particular point that the Minister has raised.

Kate Hoey: I did not quite grasp what the hon. Lady was asking. Will she repeat it?

Miss McIntosh: If I am fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope to elaborate on this matter at greater length, but the Bill clearly talks about what should happen if the accused was insane at the time. Under clause 1(2)(a), the CCRC can refer a case

"because of an argument, or evidence, not raised in the proceedings which led to the verdict".

Has the Minister had time to consider what level of evidence and proof the commission and the Court of Appeal would consider sufficient to review the case—either this case or any other?

Kate Hoey rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, again, we are going wide of the subject and extending the case being put before us on Third Reading. [Interruption.] Perhaps the Minister did talk about such matters, but sometimes the Deputy Speaker gives a Minister some leeway, in order to assist the House. Can we now return to the Third Reading debate?

Kate Hoey: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What the hon. Lady asked about is a matter for the CCRC. I suggest that she visits the commission, which will give her a full explanation of how it goes about its difficult job.

In the previous Session of Parliament, Lord Ackner introduced a Bill intended to amend the Criminal Appeal Act 1995, to enable the Criminal Cases Review Commission to refer a verdict of guilty but insane to the Court of Appeal, and to give the court powers to hear and dispose of an appeal on such a reference. That Bill was unable to complete its parliamentary passage, but on its Second Reading on 29 July last year, the Government made it clear that we fully supported its intention.

In this Session, Lord Ackner has introduced the present Bill, which has the same aim as the earlier one. It had its Second Reading in another place on 23 March, and was welcomed on both sides of the Chamber. No amendments were tabled, and no peer wished to speak during the Committee stage, so the order of commitment was discharged on 13 April. The Bill had its Third Reading, without debate, on 22 April. Its Second Reading and Committee stage in the House of Commons went through on the nod on 14 May. That is why, as I have already said, some hon. Members wanted to say something on Third Reading.

The Government accept that there is a gap in the law, which the Bill would fill. It is important for the maintenance of confidence in our system of justice—and important, above all, to individuals who believe that an injustice has been done to them—that there should be a means by which verdicts of the courts can be reviewed.

[Kate Hoey]

At present, someone against whom the verdict of guilty but insane has been returned has no avenue of appeal. That is the problem for Mr. Iain Hay Gordon. Although that verdict has been replaced, by today's standards the lack of an appeal right is an injustice—no less so for being a long-standing one. It seems particularly unjust when we remember that there is a right of appeal against the finding or verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.

It is always difficult to give exact numbers, but it seems that there is only one other such case besides that of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon, and there are not likely to be more. Moreover, there is no definite evidence that if the Bill is read for the Third time, the person concerned will use the change in the law to appeal. We are certainly not opening a floodgate.

I understand that if the Bill becomes law, the Criminal Cases Review Commission will carefully consider where Mr. Hay Gordon's case fits into the range of cases with which it is dealing. It may decide to give that case priority, or it may not; I am sure that its staff will read carefully what has been said in the House.

Mr. Swayne: Does the hon. Lady accept that the number of cases to which the Bill may give rise is immaterial? If justice requires that a remedy be provided, even for only one case, is that not sufficient to merit the change in the law?

Kate Hoey: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. That would be my view, and, I think, that of all hon. Members. If the law needs to be changed to prevent one case of injustice, that is worthy of a change in the law. The hon. Gentleman may have missed the fact that earlier this morning there were some discussions about the CCRC's resources. I shall not talk about that now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, apart from saying that we increased those resources by 15 per cent. this year, and there are now more workers in the commission. However, this case will not make a huge difference to the CCRC's work load or the resources that it will need.

I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South in the Home Affairs Committee, which recommended in its March report on the work of the Criminal Cases Review Commission that a fair passage should be given to this uncontroversial measure. The Government have sought to facilitate that, as have hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have had some correspondence with the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border, who has been helpful throughout. My officials kept closely in touch with Lord Ackner about the present Bill, and the Government are satisfied that it is properly drafted to achieve its objective and correct the long-standing anomaly.

I commend the Bill to the House as a useful and uncontroversial measure that has the Government's full support.

11.38 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): When the Bill was debated in another place, my noble friend Viscount Bridgeman said that the Opposition would welcome and support it, and I am pleased to repeat that welcome and that support for the Bill today. As my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) said earlier, even if the Bill were designed simply to provide justice for one citizen of our country, that would be justification enough for it.

However, the case of Mr. Hay Gordon has done more than reveal a potential injustice to one man; it has drawn attention to a gap in the law, and to the existence of a category of people who, through legislative oversight, are denied the right of appeal that we would consider just and necessary for any citizen convicted of a criminal offence.

As the Minister said, the difficulties can be traced back to the interpretation placed on the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 by the House of Lords, which in 1914 ruled that a person found guilty but insane was deemed by the courts to have been acquitted, because the person lacked the guilty mind required for him to be convicted of an offence.

As the verdict of guilty but insane was equivalent to acquittal, it followed that there could be no right of appeal, as in law there was no guilt. That gave rise to the crazy situation in which a man could have been labelled both guilty and insane by a court of law, but have no right of appeal, whatever new evidence or legal challenge might in other circumstances have been available to him.

In the 1960s, as the Minister said, Parliament decided to abolish the verdict of guilty but insane and to substitute the verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. At the same time, it introduced a right of appeal against such a verdict.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend described the situation as crazy, but perhaps it is not so crazy. Did not the Court of Appeal determination mean that the original verdict in effect found the accused to be not guilty, as he could not possibly have had the mens rea—the guilty mind—to commit the offence? Therefore, does not my hon. Friend agree that the jury and judge involved did not come to a determination about whether the person had committed an offence? No one has addressed that point adequately so far.

Mr. Lidington: It is not for me to inquire today into the state of mind of the House of Lords in 1914. However, it is plainly wrong and unjust in terms of common sense and natural justice for any British citizen in the position of Mr. Hay Gordon—that is, suffering the stigmas of guilt and insanity attached by the public verdict of a court—to be denied any form of redress or appeal. Dickens described the law as "a ass—a idiot", and this provision needs to be amended.

The Criminal Appeal Act 1995, which set up the Criminal Cases Review Commission, provided that any reference by the commission to the Court of Appeal should be treated as an appeal against a verdict. Because the 1914 House of Lords decision meant that there was no right of appeal against a verdict of guilty but insane, it followed that there could be no reference of such cases by the commission to the Court of Appeal.

That principle was felt to be sufficiently uncertain that Mr. Hay Gordon tested it in the courts. Legislation was discovered to be the only available resort when the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland held, in its judgment of 30 June 1998, that the 1995 Act did not allow the commission to make any reference to the Court of Appeal in such circumstances. I am satisfied that that finding demonstrated that there is a gap in the law and that justice is being denied. For those reasons the Opposition are happy to support the Bill.

11.43 am

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I shall be extremely brief. I immediately declare an interest, in that I have a long-standing friendship with Sir Frederick Crawford, the chairman of the Criminal Cases Review Commission, whom I have known for almost as long as Mr. Iain Hay Gordon has been seeking to have his case re-examined. I thought that the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) paid Sir Frederick a very handsome compliment, given the earlier controversy that surrounded him.

The second interest that I declare is that my father was Home Secretary at the time of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, which is where the possible drafting problem can be found.

As is recognised throughout the House, the Bill is driven by the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon, who has been a constituent of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) for as long as she has represented that constituency. I wish to add a brief but poignant footnote to the case.

My advancing years mean that my memory is becoming increasingly unreliable, but I remain convinced that I, too, had a constituent called Mr. Iain Hay Gordon. I am seeking to verify that, and it is of course possible that the man whom I recall bore the same name as the constituent of the hon. Member for Maryhill by total chance. I shall not go into the details of my former constituent's case, although I well recall it, and he is certainly no longer my constituent. However, as I know who his landlord was, I shall pursue the matter to resolve my curiosity, and the hon. Lady has kindly told me that she will send me a copy of her constituent's correspondence. The man whom I remember had pellucidly clear handwriting, which I would recognise instantly.

I say that my footnote is poignant because the constituent about whom I have spoken never raised with me the issue underlying the Bill. If he had, it would have immediately struck a chord with me, because of my father's role in 1964. If by any chance this is not a coincidence of name, it is a sad irony that he did not raise the matter with me.

However, whether or not I was ever the Member of Parliament representing the Iain Hay Gordon who is now the constituent of the hon. Member for Maryhill, I totally support the principle of the Bill. I hope that Mr. Iain Hay Gordon's disability can now be put right.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I am delighted to lend my support to the Bill. Although I was charmed by the Minister's invitation to visit the Criminal Cases Review Commission, the hon. Lady ought to know that, at the end of April, there were 1,176 cases awaiting review, and 444 under active review, so I doubt whether the commission would welcome fact-finding visits from Back Benchers. Our aim today is to fill a loophole in the law and to expedite the correction of miscarriages of justice.

It is ironic that we should be considering a case involving a Scot, now living in Scotland, who it is alleged committed an offence in Northern Ireland for which he was subsequently convicted. The provision that the Bill will correct covers Northern Ireland but not, happily, Scotland. Perhaps the moral is that we would not be here today had the offence been committed in Scotland.

A couple of specific points are neither covered by the Bill nor clarified in the explanatory notes. The verdict commonly referred to as guilty but insane under section 3 of the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 invites a question that I have tried to pursue with the Minister today and which I shall take up again in writing.

The question of whether the accused was permanently insane or only temporarily so has always been left open, as has the bearing on the case of the accused's state of insanity when the offence was committed. I hope that the Minister will clarify in writing whether clause 1(2)(a) refers to evidence that was not raised in proceedings but which led to the verdict. Such clarification would be welcome, and would mean that the courts would not have to spend time considering the matter.

The Bill enables the Criminal Cases Review Commission to refer to the Court of Appeal a verdict of guilty but insane reached under the 1883 Act. I query whether the Bill should have set out the degree of proof required by the Court of Appeal in cases referred to it by the commission.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) has expressed her concerns about the case of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon. I wish to enter a note of caution. Even though the Bill will receive its Third Reading today, there will still be no quick fix for people in Mr. Hay Gordon's position. The commission faces a huge backlog of cases, as I have described. The problem that we face, even in giving the Bill a Third Reading, is that, in such circumstances, Mr. Gordon and other such constituents will not have their names cleared as rapidly as they would like.

A press release of the Criminal Cases Review Commission of 15 December 1998 informed the Home Affairs Committee that there was at that time a two-year wait for the review of applicants' cases. It is most poignant that Iain Hay Gordon's case will not be expedited. I therefore make a plea to the Minister in that regard.

I record my regret that Mr. Gordon will still have two important hurdles to overcome. First, the case will have to be reviewed by the Criminal Cases Review Commission. Perhaps a subsequent private Member's Bill could facilitate the expedition of cases awaiting review. Secondly, if such a review is successful, Mr. Gordon's case will be referred to the Court of Appeal. None the less, I lend the Bill my support on Third Reading.

11.50 am

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): I support the Bill, but will raise one or two concerns about it. I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). I record the thanks that the House should give not only to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), who is the promoter of the Bill, but to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who rightly reminded the House of the inadequacy of our procedures for considering such business.

[Mr. Graham Brady]

That point was highlighted by my intervention on the Minister. I noted that the hon. Lady was passed a piece of information, and hoped to receive a substantive response to my point, but I waited in vain. She kindly offered to write to me on the matter, but to receive a letter of assurance or clarification after we have completed our consideration of the Bill would be rather inadequate. I shall therefore return to one or two points that concern me.

I have listened to the points made by my right hon. and hon. Friends, particularly those who have some legal training. It occurs to me that this is precisely the kind of debate to which the newly elected Member for Eddisbury might turn his legally trained mind in the very near future—he cannot quite yet contribute to the debate.

I note in passing that in Eddisbury just two days ago, I saw the wonderful spectacle of three Labour Members on one poor gentleman's doorstep, which reminded me of old jokes about psychotherapists changing light bulbs. I do not know how many Labour Members it takes to lose a by-election.

I am entirely happy with the purpose and thrust of the Bill because it will be permissive legislation in the best possible sense. It will allow the process of justice to move forward, which must surely be a good thing. However, because we have not had an opportunity properly to debate the Bill's effects, I have some remaining concerns. The Bill may allow the Criminal Cases Review Commission and the Court of Appeal to improve matters by removing the stigma of insanity, but surely that same stigma is attached to the verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.

That brings me to the point that I raised with the Minister. There are two separate elements to both verdicts and therefore two findings. One is that the person is not guilty and the other is a matter of the reason why, which implies insanity or incapacity on the part of the individual concerned. That may be an issue in the later type of verdict—not guilty by reason of insanity—following the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, but it is vital to those who have been found guilty but insane.

If the cases of such people—there may be one or more than one, we do not know—are referred to the Court of Appeal by the Criminal Cases Review Commission, what remains if the verdict of guilty but insane is struck down? Is it to be presumed that the person is simply not guilty, or would the court merely be saying that the verdict of guilty but insane was wrong? Despite the court taking the view that the person was not insane, the possibility that the person was guilty remains. Conversely, the court could remove the finding that a person was guilty but leave the question of insanity. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

Kate Hoey: May I clarify the matter? As the explanatory notes state, there is no difference between the verdicts. If a case goes to the Court of Appeal in either of the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman is referring, it is up to the Court of Appeal to decide whether the person is guilty or not guilty.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister, but my concern remains. The Court of Appeal can decide whether the person is guilty or not guilty, but can it decide whether the person is insane or not insane? There is no provision or clarity in the Bill about what is left following the Court of Appeal's addressing of the case. It may throw out one verdict, but does that clear the name of the individual? It may be entirely appropriate in some cases totally to exonerate an individual, but in others it may be appropriate to allow one part of the verdict to remain.

Such a sticking point will not stand in our way in making the Bill law, but to conclude on the thought with which I began, it points to the woeful inadequacy of the ability of the House to scrutinise such matters. It is not acceptable that such an important detail—it may be just a detail—in the criminal law should be dealt with in a very brief Friday morning debate in which we have had very little opportunity properly to scrutinise the implications of what is proposed.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I shall take two or three minutes, if I may, to make some remarks about the Bill, as I have been kindly mentioned by several speakers, including the Minister. I had made notes for a much longer speech, but most of the comments that can be made on the law have been made by other Conservative Members and I merely wish to make a couple of quick observations.

We had no debate on Second Reading, partly because some of my hon. Friends were persuaded that in order to deal with this urgent problem—an important issue of the human rights of another human being—we should allow the Bill to pass into Committee, after which we could discuss it here on Third Reading. That goes against all my principles of not allowing a measure to receive a Second Reading on the nod, without proper scrutiny. I apologise to my hon. Friends who rightly complained this morning that they could not participate in a Second Reading debate and that they would have liked to discuss some points in Committee, but if we had insisted on a Second Reading debate the Bill would have been killed, and would not now be before the House.

I am grateful to the Minister and to Lord Williams of Mostyn—an elegant and sincere man. It is wonderful to think that there can be life peers with all the status, breeding and tact of the hereditary peers. Lord Williams of Mostyn was kind enough to invite me and some of my right hon. Friends to the Home Office to explain the purposes of the Bill. I have concluded that, although I may have some worries, it was best to let the Bill proceed so that we might hold this Third Reading debate.

I appreciate that you must uphold the rules of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but some of my hon. Friends who went slightly wide of the tight restrictions on speaking on the Iain Hay Gordon Bill did so in order to cover issues that they could not have covered in debates on other matters.

I welcome the measure, even though there are concerns that it is retrospective, going back, as it does, more than 40 years. There are precedents for retrospective legislation, but the Bill also deals with a single case. There are a few examples of legislation dealing with hard cases, but often they cover a category wider than one person. Those points were discussed in more detail by my colleagues.

Is it appropriate for the House of Commons to pass this legislation in a minute's time, when it will not be able to go to another place for further consideration, in order to deal with one person who is no longer in prison, whose case was heard 40 years ago? I have concluded that in this case it is appropriate; the interests of that human being and the interests of justice suggest that. I therefore have pleasure in supporting the Bill.

12 noon

Mr. Mullin: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is no reason for me to dwell on the subject. We have had quite a good debate. The point at issue is narrow and I have not detected outright opposition to the Bill from anyone who has spoken. I thought that the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) summarised the position perfectly well.

I shall not respond to all the arguments made by hon. Members, as I suspect that some were motivated more by an interest in mink farming than by an interest in the Criminal Cases Review Commission or the Iain Hay Gordon case. [Interruption.] I do not want to wind up Conservative Members, so I shall not make anything of that point.

The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border said that the Bill was about a single case. That is not quite true. It is about a category of cases of which there are only, as far as I know, two known examples, of which by far the most prominent is that of Mr. Iain Hay Gordon.

The Bill has hardly any implications for resources. There is no need to become bogged down in the Iain Hay Gordon case, because the commission, not Parliament, will decide whether to refer the case back, and it is for the commission to decide what priority to give it, although in my view the circumstances are so exceptional that it should be dealt with as swiftly as possible. The commission has probably also reached that view.

Even assuming that the commission refers the case back to the Court of Appeal, Mr. Hay Gordon has another fairly high hurdle to surmount, which is to persuade the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal to quash the conviction. I shall watch carefully how the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal deals with the case. That court has a reputation for being—I put it generously—rather conservative in this area. It is perhaps under old management—unlike the British Court of Appeal, which, over the years, has suffered a few serious shocks which have caused it to look with a slightly more open mind at some of the cases coming before it. I hope that that process is now finding its way over to Northern Ireland and that Mr. Iain Hay Gordon will benefit.

As I detect no real opposition to the Bill, it remains for me to commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, without amendment.

Mental Health (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

REPORT TO MENTAL WELFARE COMMISSION

(2) A report under subsection (1) shall be submitted no later than 18 months after the discharge from hospital of the patient concerned, and thereafter on an annual basis, until such time as either—

(a) the patient is considered by the medical officer in charge of his case to be capable of adequately managing and administering his property and affairs; or

(b) a curator bonis is appointed in respect of that person.

(3) Any report submitted under subsection (1) above shall be made available on application to any person who, in the judgement of the Mental Welfare Commission, has a legitimate interest in its contents.'.—[Mr. Forth.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.3 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 4—Right of appeal—

'( ) Any person shall have the right to appeal to the Mental Welfare Commission against—

(a) the holding by the managers of a hospital of money and valuables on behalf of a person under section 93(3A) of the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1984; or

(b) the expenditure of money or disposal of valuables in pursuance of section 93(3) of that Act.

(2) Where the Commission upholds the grounds of such an appeal, it shall determine what recompense shall be payable by the hospital to the patient concerned.'.

Amendment No. 2, in clause 1, page 1, line 8, after 'may', insert

', for a period not exceeding five years following the discharge of the patient,'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'( ) The managers of a hospital may exercise their powers under this section until such time as either—

(a) the patient is considered by the medical officer in charge of his case to be capable of adequately managing and administering his property and affairs; or

(b) a curator bonis is appointed in respect of that person.

( ) Any person may at any time request that the patient's ability to manage and administer his property and affairs be reviewed by the medical officer in charge of the case.'.

Amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(3C) For the purposes of subsections (3A) and (3B) of this section—

(a) "money" shall include bank notes and coins and sums deposited in a bank or building society account;

(b) "other financial assets and investments" shall include stocks, shares, Government bonds, personal equity plans, tax exempt special savings Accounts, individual savings accounts, unit trusts, corporate bonds, pension funds and life assurance;

(c) "money", "other financial assets and investments" and "valuables" shall include sums and items inherited by the patient when resident in hospital or subsequent to discharge from hospital.'.

Mr. Forth: We have now arrived at a crucial stage in the consideration of the Bill, which has indeed been through its process. It received a Second Reading, and the Committee, on which I had the honour of serving, considered the Bill briefly. In Committee, one or two questions arose, to which I believe that the House will want to return, so as to satisfy itself. I hope that it will be accepted that the new clauses and amendments are a genuine attempt to improve the Bill, to ensure that it takes a balanced approach to the problem that everyone accepts exists.

By good fortune—or, more probably, good organisation—I received in my mail this morning, from the Law Society of Scotland no less, a letter referring to the Bill. It says that the Law Society of Scotland supports the Bill. It then very eloquently describes the purposes of the Bill.

The letter states:

"This Bill seeks to amend Section 94 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984, which enables managers of a hospital to receive and hold money and valuables on behalf of incapable patients who are detained in hospital or are receiving treatment there. Section 94 does not permit the managers to release the funds to the patient or anyone else when the patient ceases to receive treatment in the hospital and returns to live in the community. Where there is no curator or other person legally authorised to receive money on behalf of the patient, the funds become trapped and patients are prevented from getting access to their own resources."

The letter continues:

"The Bill will attempt to resolve this specific problem by allowing the managers of hospitals to continue to hold monies and valuables which they are holding at the time of the patient's discharge, and empower them to spend money or dispose of the valuables for the benefit of the patient in terms of Section 94, even though the patient is no longer detained in hospital . . . The Society supports the Bill and recognises that it will solve a problem which is affecting a substantial number of former hospital residents in Scotland. The Bill is of great importance to vulnerable persons in Scotland."

The society urges me to give it my support.

I read out the letter because I think that it states elegantly the purpose behind the Bill and the background to it, and because it lends the distinguished support of the Law Society of Scotland to the purposes of the Bill. So far, so good. The objectives behind the Bill are clear and at one level we can have little or no argument with them. However, I believe that the Bill raises a number of important questions and issues, with which the new clauses and amendments are designed to deal.

The hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) is managing the Bill on behalf of the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke). We all wish the hon. Gentleman a speedy recovery. We hope to see him back in the House very soon. We hope also that the way in which we deal with the Bill will give him even more reason to feel better and to return. I hope that the hon. Lady and the Minister have given serious consideration to the new clauses and amendments. They are designed to improve the Bill in some important ways.

First, I seek to improve the Bill in the area of accountability. As soon as we start to talk about a vulnerable section of society—people who are by definition incapable in one way or another—and about someone else having responsibility and control over the assets of the incapable person, we are raising important issues of accountability and of possible appeal.

I would have thought that the purpose behind new clause 1 is almost self-evident. It states:

"Where the managers of a hospital exercise their powers . . . they shall submit regular reports in writing to the Mental Welfare Commission about the discharge of the powers under that section."

Surely that is unarguable and almost self-evident. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and I want to ensure and guarantee as far as we can that there can be no possibility of mishap, malfeasance or whatever in the handling of moneys of a vulnerable person by somebody else.

I do not suggest that that is likely or probable. The very people to whom existing legislation and the Bill would give responsibility are those who are for the most part dedicated to their task of dealing with vulnerable people. That is not to say that we should ignore our responsibility to provide as many safeguards as possible for the discharge of that important responsibility.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): At least part of the value of the new clause is that it will give a measure of reassurance to relatives who suspect that things may not have been done as well as they might have been.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who raises an important matter that should not be treated lightly. Although I shall concentrate on the relationship between the patient and the hospital, my hon. Friend is right to point out that those close to the patient are often the most worried. We have a responsibility to them as well. They have seen their nearest and dearest in unfortunate circumstances, and they—the relatives and friends—want the maximum reassurance that all is as it should be.

I therefore suggest in new clause 1 that the submission of regular reports in writing about the discharge of that responsibility is the least that we can expect. It is a minimum provision on which we can build, and on which I shall build as I argue for my various new clauses and amendments.

New clause 1 goes on to state, importantly, that any report

"shall be submitted no later than 18 months after the discharge from hospital of the patient concerned, and thereafter on an annual basis".

In other words, we want to make sure that reports are issued not too frequently, but sufficiently frequently to give reassurance and to allow a proper basis of accountability in the discharge of an important responsibility, until the patient is considered able to manage his or her affairs, or until a curator bonis is appointed, and the responsibility passes on from the person specified under the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984, which we seek to amend, and moves out of the purview of this legislation.

New clause 1 is a minimum requirement, so I shall not dwell on it. New clause 4 raises an issue of more fundamental importance, which I hope that the hon. Member for Paisley, North and the Minister will want to deal with appropriately—the right of any person to appeal to the Mental Welfare Commission against "the holding by the managers of a hospital of money and valuables" on behalf of the incapable person, or

"the expenditure of money or disposal of valuables"

in pursuance of section 93(3) of the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1984.

That is a basic mechanism which it is essential to build in to give proper reassurance to the most vulnerable that they have a right to appeal if they or, as my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) suggested, their relatives or friends felt that anything being done was in any way wrong.

I doubt whether there would ever be outright theft or misuse of the money or valuables, but let us suppose that it was considered that moneys were being unwisely invested and that a sufficient rate of return was not being obtained. I shall return to that later, in the context of later amendments.

The right to appeal if someone feels that his assets are not being properly managed to his maximum benefit is unarguable. We are keenly sensitive to the needs of vulnerable groups and put in place all sorts of mechanisms to protect them. I am in danger now of arguing against myself, but I sometimes feel that we do too much in that direction. That is my view with regard to people who are able-bodied and in full possession of their faculties. They should largely be able to fend for themselves, but in the present case, we are dealing with a vulnerable group.

Such people may not have friends and relatives to help them. They may be on their own, as I suspect all too many of them are, and for that reason they are doubly or trebly vulnerable.

12.15 pm

In that context, the right to appeal is surely important.

Subsection (2) says that where the Mental Welfare Commission upholds the grounds of such an appeal, it shall "determine what recompense shall be payable by the hospital to the patient concerned."

That is an important issue. We are saying not only that there should be accountability for the discharge of that important responsibility—and that there should be a right to appeal—but that where it is established that some damage has been done to the interests of the incapable person, there must be a provision for recompense.

All too often, a vulnerable person entrusts—or has had entrusted to someone else—his money or assets, and when something goes wrong, is left wondering why he has no ability to recover what has been lost. There should be the ability to provide recompense on such an occasion, although I am sure that such cases will be the exception rather than the rule.

An interesting presumption underlies the Bill—that someone in management in a hospital, whose main skill is in dealing with people's mental and physical welfare, is equally capable of dealing with financial affairs. I am not sure that that is self-evidently the case, and we may wish to air that matter again on Third Reading.

I am prepared to accept that a hospital manager would not in every case personally discharge responsibility, and that he may delegate it to someone else. However, that raises other implications. If the institution is a relatively small one and does not have a large bureaucracy or a large number of people available, the manager might have to take the responsibility on personally. I do not know. However, some important questions are starting to arise on the detailed application of a simple and straightforward principle.

The Law Society of Scotland—bless it—was kind enough to write to me to say that the Bill was splendid, much overdue and desperately wanted in Scotland. I have no doubts about that. However, I wonder whether the Law Society looked in detail at the Bill. I received the letter only this morning, just before I came into the Chamber, and I have not had the chance to discuss with the Law Society whether it feels that the new clauses and amendments add to the Bill. That might have been a valuable contribution to the debate. Perhaps there is some way in which the Law Society could let us know before the end of this short debate, and before we speed the Bill on its way—amended by my new clauses and amendments, I trust.

Amendment No. 2 tries to impose a reasonable time limit on the processes of the Bill. I concede immediately that, in this context, there are pluses and minuses in imposing arbitrary time limits. My purpose is to try to provide a framework within which the mechanism can work so that it can be subject to periodic review. I propose a period of five years. Some might feel that to be too long, but there should be a measure to provide a time frame for the operation of the Bill.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the argument for a time frame is supported by the Scottish Association for Mental Health? Admittedly, it favours a much shorter period than that which we have specified, but it considers the absence of a time limit to be a small but significant gap.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend's point shows that, even though the Bill was debated in the Chamber on Second Reading and in Committee, legitimately interested parties such as the one to which he refers and the Law Society of Scotland are coming forward at this stage in proceedings to make such points. Our amendments are an attempt to respond to some of them. No doubt my right hon. Friend will make his own justification of them, should he catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Suffice to say that the point made by my right hon. Friend, for which I am grateful, shows that people outside the House who watch the progress of Bills take the opportunity at each stage—particularly in Committee and on Report—to give Members of the House the benefit of their experience so that amendments may be drawn up. That is the essence of the legislative process and that example has certainly shown the value of it. I am grateful to him for reinforcing the argument for our modest amendment, and I hope that we will not fall out over the time scale. All I want to establish is that there is good reason for specifying a time limit rather than not having one.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): My right hon. Friend says that the legislative process provides the opportunity for outside bodies to make representations. Has he received any about the time scale he suggests?

[Mr. Peter Luff]

Five years seems to be a rather arbitrary figure. I am persuaded by his argument in principle, but where has that magic figure come from?

Mr. Forth: As ever, that is a most reasonable question and one with which we wrestle frequently in these contexts. Any time scale is, of necessity, arbitrary; it comes down to a matter of judgment. Our judgment is that five years is about right.

I have not received the representation that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) has received, but I have received a letter from the Law Society of Scotland, which he has not received. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) has received such a letter.

Mr. Luff indicated dissent.

Mr. Forth: I make no complaint about it, but a series of representations on different points have come in to us, which has enabled us to seek to improve the Bill. That is as it should be. To finish my inadequate answer to his point, I confess that five years is an arbitrary figure. Although our judgment is that that figure is appropriate to what we were seeking to achieve, I would not say that it is the final answer. However, it provides a time context.

Mr. Maclean: I merely wish to answer the point that my right hon. Friend has raised. I have not received such a letter—not because one has not been sent, but because I have been tardy in collecting my mail this morning—and I did not receive a letter from the Scottish Association for Mental Health. I suggest that, for the millennium, he connect his computer to the internet and then surf cyberspace; he will find all the representations there, as I did.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend well knows that vile expressions such as "cyberspace" are alien to me. I have never yet surfed the internet and I hope to survive for some considerable time without surfing it. I know that, for him, the internet is the source of a considerable amount of information, and I wish him well in that, but I prefer my mind to remain relatively uncluttered in these matters. I also prefer to receive my information from the written word on the page. I am old-fashioned that way and I find it reassuring to hold a document in my hand, as I am now—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. None of those matters have anything to do with the new clause.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am making the mistake of being led astray by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) rose—

Mr. Forth: I hope that my hon. Friend is not about to do the same.

Mr. McLoughlin: Can my right hon. Friend assist me? The Bill applies only to Scotland. This is the United Kingdom Parliament and, although these matters may now be for consideration by the Scottish Parliament, can he explain the position in respect of England? We need to know that all citizens of the United Kingdom are being treated equally.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We will worry about the amendment that is being discussed.

Mr. Forth: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker—and it must be said, in fairness, that my hon. Friend will have an opportunity, within the rules of order, to explore that point later. Indeed, I hope to do so myself, but I will not be misled at this stage.

Mr. Swayne rose—

Mr. Forth: I hope that my hon. Friend is not going to try to mislead me.

Mr. Swayne: No; I want to refer precisely to the amendment, and the arbitrary choice of five years. What does my right hon. Friend propose should happen at the end of that period? He should remember that the Bill is designed to remedy the weakness whereby, at present, a person must engage in an expensive process in order to obtain control of the funds. By introducing a five-year limit, my right hon. Friend may undermine the Bill's purpose.

Mr. Forth: I hope not. I am not going to disagree violently with my hon. Friend; I merely say that our aim was to introduce a long stop, as it were, forcing the matter to be reviewed after five years. That is why we chose a longer rather than a shorter period. I accept that any measure of this kind is fraught with certain difficulties: I do not dissent from that at all. The amendment was intended to provide a beneficial long stop.

Mr. Swayne: I have another question, which refers specifically to the amendment, but also refers generally to it and the new clauses and amendments grouped with it. My understanding is that the Bill is very much a temporary measure pending a much wider review of the law in respect of these matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman keeps talking about the Bill. We are discussing a specific amendment—or rather, several specific amendments. The hon. Gentleman cannot talk about the Bill at this stage.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may well be that on Third Reading we shall be allowed just a little latitude to discuss the point raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Swayne: May I say something, on the question of the amendments?

Mr. Forth: Only on the amendments, please.

Mr. Swayne: Is not the force of the new clauses and amendments reduced by the fact that the Bill is a temporary measure? Is there any reason for introducing arbitrary limits such as the five-year limit, given the time limit that applies to the Bill as a whole?

Mr. Forth: I do not say this very often, but I will say it to my hon. Friend now, in a spirit of friendship. I have been in the House for 16 years, and had the privilege of serving in government for nearly nine years. I know that very few things in this place are temporary. We are all aware that procedures relating to a measure that may well appear now to be subject to review are likely to continue for rather a long time. I do not want to rest my case on the assumption that the Bill is only a temporary measure, and that everything will be sorted out soon. As you know even better than I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is a pretty risky approach, and I do not accept what my hon. Friend has said in this instance.

I want to press on. I want to give others a chance to explore these matters, and I do not want to jeopardise the passage of the Bill. Let me say something about amendments Nos. 1 and 5. What we are trying to do is consistent with our aim in, particularly, the new clauses. I shall skip the preamble, but amendment No. 1 provides, in essence, that

"any person may at any time request that the patient's ability to manage and administer his property and affairs be reviewed by the medical officer in charge of the case."

We want to build in the opportunity for a review to take place, in the interests of the patient, and to allow those who may also have the patient's interests at heart—in addition to hospital managers and others—to have an input. This is a protective mechanism, and I think that it is at one with the purposes of the new clauses.

Let me now deal with an amendment that applies to a rather different issue, although it is grouped with the other amendments and new clauses. My amendment—I apologise; it is not my amendment, but that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), and I want to express my support for it. What I suspect my right hon. Friend had in mind—certainly, this is how I interpret the amendment—is this: we want to make absolutely certain that the terminology of the Bill covers all reasonable circumstances and eventualities in the important context of money, assets and so on.

12.30 pm

That is why the amendment seeks to go in a little detail into the sort of assets that would be covered. It talks not only about money in the obvious sense. We believe that it is important to bring other assets within the definition in the Bill to allow their management to the advantage of the patient. The amendment covers and, importantly, says that those include stocks, shares, Government bonds, personal equity plans and so on. We are not attempting to be exhaustive—not to say exhausting—but we want to try to ensure that, in the fulfilment of the purpose of the Bill, we encompass all possible assets, particularly those that are interest bearing, so that there is no danger that the proper interests of patients are neglected, or minimised by an over-restrictive Bill.

"other financial assets and investments"

That is the thrust of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border is getting at, but he will explain his position, I hope, in a moment. I wanted simply to lend support to what I understood to be the purpose of the Bill, and to ensure that the patient's interests are fully looked after.

Hon. Members can see the thrust of what we are doing. The new clauses and amendments are designed to enhance the Bill, to protect the incapable person as far as possible, and to ensure as far as we reasonably can—without, I hope, being too bureaucratic—that, when the patient, or friends or relatives of the patient think that there is a risk of the patient's interest not being fully looked after, mechanisms are provided in the Bill to guard against that.

That is the thrust of the new clauses and amendments. I hope that they will be looked on kindly by the hon. Member for Paisley, North, on behalf of the promoter of the Bill, and by the Minister. However, if, for some reason that I could not possibly understand, they were minded to ask the House not to accept the amendments, at the very least I would want full assurances that the concerns that lie behind the new clauses and amendments could be fully covered within the existing terms of the Bill, without any further amendment. That is the very least that we would expect.

I am sure that the Law Society of Scotland is hovering somewhere, listening to the proceedings. I cannot speak for it, but I am sure that it would have the same worries. If the hon. Member for Paisley, North and the Minister are not going to satisfy me, they of all people will have to answer to the Law Society of Scotland if they do not get it absolutely right.

Mr. Luff: It is in the nature of these Fridays that a Bill that first looks totally uncontroversial and unproblematic acquires a new character as we listen to the arguments that are expounded by hon. Members. I was particularly struck by the group of amendments and new clauses that we are discussing following the comments by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) in Committee. He said that the Bill

"is the model private Member's Bill. It is short, it is non-controversial, it has the Government's blessing and the hon. Gentleman introduced it in good style. I wish it God speed."—[Official Report, Second Scottish Standing Committee, 19 May 1999; c. 3.]

Any Bill that my right hon. Friend wishes God speed must indeed be a good Bill.

I am delighted to see that the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) is here to take the Bill through, in the place of the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), who, sadly, is unable to do so. I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst in wishing him a speedy recovery.

I genuinely believe that the amendments and new clauses deserve at least to be answered by the Government, or the hon. Member for Paisley, North, because they raise genuinely important issues. As I understand it, by the end of the year, the safeguards in the amendments and new clauses could apply to some 750 people and to assets totalling about £3 million, so it is not an inconsequential issue for the House to consider.

I am grateful to the Library for its helpful briefing note on the Bill. I realised that the safeguards that are alluded to in the amendments and new clauses were of great importance when I read the extent of the concern in Scotland about the current position. It is not simply a matter of there being no power to move the funds from the hospital when the patient moves on; there are deeper-seated concerns. That is why it is so important to have safeguards.

I have some reservations about one of my right hon. Friend's amendments, which has some vagueness in its drafting and I shall turn to that later. However, the Government and the promoter of the Bill would do well to take the amendments seriously.

According to the Library, all that is required for the hospital to take over the management of a patient's funds is for a responsible medical officer to state that, in his opinion, the patient is incapable of managing and administering his property and affairs by reason of mental disorder. That is quite a simple test and there are probably clear-cut cases, nevertheless safeguards must be appropriate.

I am aware that there have been changes in the monitoring of expenditure by hospitals and that is welcome, but if the Bill is to proceed, as I am sure it will, we need to be confident that the right safeguards are in place.

The Scottish Law Commission's discussion paper on managing the welfare and finances of incapable adults made a number of telling criticisms of the absence of safeguards in the system: only one medical certificate is required; there is no opportunity to challenge a certificate; central management by hospitals may be regarded as remote and impersonal; no individual is appointed with specific responsibility and it is not clear how far the duty to receive money extends. It is right that the House should consider those worrying points when extending the scope of legislation.

I am particularly concerned about section 94 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984, which states:

"managers shall have regard to the sentimental value that any article may have for the patient".

That seems to be a difficult judgment to make, as the provision recognises when it continues,

"or would have but for his mental disorder".

It is tremendously difficult to judge what may be of sentimental value to an individual. My wife had the invidious task of emptying my mother's house on her death and she made judgments as to which items in the house were of sentimental value to me. On the whole, she did a remarkable job, but one or two things that I would have liked still went into the skip.

Mr. Forth: Let me give my hon. Friend a surprising example to reinforce his point. It is even possible that company stocks and shares may be of sentimental value. When I inherited a modest share portfolio, I decided to keep one or two shares that had been very good for my mother over a period of time. Therefore, I had a peculiarly sentimental attachment to them. Even something as apparently banal or financial as a share could in some circumstances come under the definition to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Luff: Strangely, I agree with my right hon. Friend. If I were to be placed in the position covered by the Bill, there are two groups of shares that I hold that I would not want to be disposed of on my behalf by a hospital manager or anyone else. They include shares in the Severn Valley Railway, of which I am a vice-president and shares in another company which were bought by my mother on the advice of a travelling salesman. They were a disastrous investment as they collapsed in value and any manager might well consider disposing of them on my behalf, but I would be sorry if they were sold. I shall not name the company as that would be invidious, but my right hon. Friend makes a genuine point. The strangest items can have sentimental value. They are not limited to paintings, keepsakes, souvenirs and books; even financial instruments can have such an attachment.

I am particularly concerned to know what rights the relatives of a patient have to disagree with any expenditure on behalf of that patient. A number of us will have had difficult constituency cases involving mentally incapacitated adults. Watching families, close relations or, in one case the fiancé of a patient shows that it is a difficult and painful process. It is crucial that when a manager spends money to benefit a patient, the family has some rights to challenge that expenditure.

On 12 March, the Bill had a long Second Reading. A cynic might say that that had something to do with legislation that should have been considered after the Bill—such as the important Bus Fuel Duty (Exemptions) Bill, promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). Nevertheless, the Second Reading debate was a good one. However, one sentence in the Minister's reply to the debate caught my eye and worried me, which is partly why I believe that the safeguards proposed in this group of amendments are so important. The Minister said:

"anyone who deals with a person's funds has an obligation to account for his actions. If he is negligent, that can be remedied under common law."—[Official Report, 12 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 646.]

Mr. Forth: Oh, no.

Mr. Luff: That is the safeguard that we are being offered by the Minister, but it is a sledgehammer to crack a nut. The approach suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst offers a much better way of dealing with the problems. We are often talking about quite small sums and I am loathe to hand to lawyers the "benefit" of a dispute on issues that are often tragic and personal, involving painful and difficult decisions. We could find less painful dispute-resolution procedures than those offered by the Minister in his reply, which greatly concerned me.

The Minister also gave some assurances on safeguards to the House. Although ministerial assurances are always welcome, I much prefer statements to be made in a Bill—which is what this group of amendments would do. Warm words uttered at the Dispatch Box are always worth having and Ministers can generally be held to account for the promises that they make, but the Minister said:

"Several hon. Members made the point that we need to ensure that reasonable and proper safeguards are in place . . . The hospital manager will retain responsibility for the funds . . . There will need to be close co-operation between the new carer in the community and the hospital manager. I anticipate that the procedures, which will be put in place when the Bill becomes law, will enable the new carer to apply to the hospital manager for the release of funds, as the occasion arises, to be spent in the most appropriate way for the person's benefit."

The Minister said

"I anticipate that the procedures . . . will be put in place".

We can anticipate many things, but I should much prefer clear-cut legal procedures to be in place, rather than a Minister's anticipation of procedures. We all know that, in English affairs—I cannot speak with the same authority on Scottish affairs—relationships between health services and social services are often, to say the least, tense. Often, the barrier between the two services leads to the most unwelcome disputes in how an individual's affairs are handled. I am, therefore, concerned to think that the Minister merely anticipates that the two bodies will be able to agree matters between them in a friendly way.

The Minister gave a further assurance. He said:

"I undertake to ensure that further guidance is issued to those who will be required to operate the new provisions. The guidance will set out, for example, how money should be requested from hospital managers, and how hospital managers should consider such requests."—[Official Report, 12 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 650.]

I do not know whether the Minister will be able to say, in his reply to this group of amendments, that that guidance has become available. As I said, I hope that at least some of the amendments and new clauses in this group will commend themselves, so that the existence of such guidance will not be so important. However, if the Government or the hon. Member for Paisley, North do not intend to accept any of these amendments, the guidance would become very important and it would be good to know what progress has been made in developing it since the Minister gave that assurance to the House on 12 March.

Those are my primary arguments on this group of amendments. However, I had some reservations about amendment No. 1, which, in its final subsection, states:

"Any person may at any time request that the patient's ability to manage and administer his property and affairs be reviewed by the medical officer in charge of the case."

"Any person" "at any time" seems to be an extraordinarily wide-ranging provision, and I should like to know from my right hon. Friends who tabled the amendment why it proposes such a provision.

Mr. Maclean rose—

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Luff: I am spoilt by this embarrassment of riches. As I have heard a great deal today from my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, I shall first take the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. Maclean: I accept that the terminology "any person" seems wide-ranging, but to try to define the individual categories of person who may have an interest—whether relatives, friends or a curator bonis, who is mentioned in the amendment—could lead to a very long list and would inevitably, in some peculiar circumstances, exclude people who are relevant. I therefore felt it better to use the terminology "any person", trusting that those who did not enter that category would have the discipline and the sense not to interfere in the affairs of someone else and behave like a busybody. In any case, the commissioner or medical officer would have the final say on whether and how to proceed.

Mr. Luff: Does my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst wish to add to that intervention, so that I can deal with both points at the same time?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is extraordinarily generous in giving way. I wish to take up the other point, just to show how inseparable my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and I are on these matters. The phrase "at any time" is important because the whole point of the safeguards that we seek to introduce is that those with the responsibility under the existing statute, amended by this Bill if it is enacted, must be aware that, at any time, others with the interests of the patient at heart can step in and exercise the powers to be given in the amendment. That phrase is, therefore, an important safeguard and it must not be limited.

Mr. Luff: I understand the import of the amendment. Without wishing to appear invidious, I am no more persuaded by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst than I am by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border. I apologise for that. I am satisfied on the "at any time" provision, but "any person" still seems very wide ranging, given the nature of the disputes that often arise and the question of incapacitated people. That is a matter of concern to me.

I accept that the amendment is important, as it stops a hospital being locked into administering the funds in perpetuity. That seems to be a good thing. If the Minister is comfortable with the words "any person", I hope that the amendment will be acceptable to him and to the hon. Member for Paisley, North, who is in charge of the Bill.

Mr. Swayne: I am not persuaded by the force of the arguments in favour of the amendment. The Bill tackles a clear-cut problem in anticipation of a wider reform that will attend to difficulties that go beyond its scope. [Interruption.] I hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) tut-tutting because of my lack of experience of how long situations may persist when it was anticipated that they would be remedied rather sooner. However, the force of that argument is undermined by the fact that the remedies that he seeks to include in the Bill will affect only people whose assets continue to be administered in that way after they have left the hospital to go into community care. Those obligations, and that way of operating, are not imposed on people whose funds will continue to be administered by the hospital because they have remained in the hospital.

Therefore, the amendment introduces two distinct categories to manage the funds available to patients: one set of rules and procedures for those who have been discharged, and another for those who remain within the hospital.

Mr. Forth: I think that I am right in saying that one would not have been allowed to do what my hon. Friend suggests by reason of the long title of the Bill. The Bill authorises

"hospital managers to ... hold ... the property of persons to whom section 94(1) of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 no longer applies."

I am no expert in these matters, but I think that I am right in saying that, had we attempted to amend the law as my hon. Friend suggests—I am sympathetic to what he says—we would not have been allowed to amend this Bill as he suggests because of its long title.

Mr. Swayne: I did not suggest for one moment that the Bill was amendable in that way. It is precisely because it is not that the force of the amendments is undermined. Precisely because of the defect in the procedure to which my right hon. Friend has drawn attention and our inability to remedy it here, we shall be introducing a different set of procedures for patients who remain in hospital.

I shall be brief because I wish to speak on a different matter this morning.

Mr. Maclean: Is my hon. Friend saying that he sees some merit in the amendment, but does not like it because it does not amend another Bill in tandem, or is he suggesting that the amendment has no merit and he would accept it only if all the relevant legislation were amended in a similar fashion?

Mr. Swayne: I hope that the force of what I am saying will become clear as I deal with each new clause and amendment.

New clause 1 would require hospital managers to submit regular reports. I entirely understand the motive behind the requirement and I followed the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, who made proper reference to the anxieties of outsiders, friends and relatives, but I fear that a bureaucratic burden would be imposed with regard to one particular category of patients and no other. Pending the wider reform of the law governing the assets of people with a poor record of mental health, which we have been promised, it would be unwise for us to complicate the Bill by introducing that distinction.

Mr. Maclean: I disagree profoundly. Adrian Ward, an expert in the matter, in his book "The Power to Act", said that hospital management provides "a relatively quick and inexpensive method of administrating funds and possessions of a modest value. It avoids the cumbersomeness of accounting to, and supervision by, the . . . Court. It does not impair any existing legal capacity."

Mr. Swayne: Precisely. Is there any need, in that case, to add the bureaucratic burden of regular reports from which patients who remained in the hospital would not benefit?

I wonder whether the requirement in subsection (2)(a) of new clause 1 is a proper one to place on the medical officer. I refer to my own experience in a constituency case in which there is a profound disagreement between the parents of a mentally ill individual and his medical carers. The latter take the view that he is capable of administering his affairs, and the former that he is not. I wonder whether the medical officer is capable of taking decisions on issues that govern the protection of standing orders, assets and other items.

To an extent, my concern about subsection (2)(a) is ameliorated by amendment No. 1. I would not want the new clause to be added without the amendment, but for larger reasons I would prefer that neither of them be added.

New clause 4 is entirely understandable, but its force is undermined by the fact that the right of appeal would apply only to those patients who have been discharged, whereas those who remain in the hospital, who might equally have a grievance, would not benefit. There is an argument that says that simply because some people cannot benefit from a remedy, we ought not to allow no one to benefit from it.

Mr. Maclean: Precisely.

Mr. Swayne: As the relevant law is shortly to be reviewed in its entirety—quite properly, that will happen in the Scottish Parliament, not this Parliament—such matters should be left for the Scottish Parliament to deal with; it is not for us to sort them out.

The motives that lie behind the amendments and new clauses are proper and understandable, but I fear that they would place a bureaucratic burden on hospitals, because of the administration required of them in the preparation of reports. More fundamentally, the amendments and new clauses would also introduce a different way of dealing with the property and assets of two categories of patients, and I believe that that is not currently justified.

Mr. Maclean: I shall speak to the amendments and new clauses tabled in my name, most of which also bear the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). In view of the thrust of the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne)—that we should not make the amendments now, although he seemed to say that they had some merit, merely because, by the nature of the Bill, they cannot cover everyone—I may now have to elaborate slightly more than I intended if I am to persuade him of my case.

Many amendments have been tabled, and there is little time available to debate them, but this first group goes to the heart of the Bill; it is the most important group.

Both new clauses mention the Mental Welfare Commission, so I must explain why I chose that. New clause 4 says

"Any person shall have the right to appeal to the Mental Welfare Commission against . . . the holding by the managers of a hospital of money or valuables . . . or . . . the expenditure of money or disposal of valuables" and so on.

I picked the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland because it plays a major role in protecting the persons and interests of mentally incapable adults, whether they are in hospital, other institutions or the community. In financial affairs, it must inquire into any case in which it appears to it that such a person's property may be exposed to loss or damage. It must also notify any hospital or local authority when it considers that it should exercise its functions to prevent or redress loss of or damage to property. In addition, I understand that it has various duties to visit patients detained in hospital.

In 1997, it was estimated that in our population up to 100,000 people were incapax at any one time. This number is likely to grow rather than decline, as life expectancy outstrips medical science's ability to prevent or cure the various forms of age-related mental deterioration.

The Mental Welfare Commission plays a vital role and seems a relatively cheap and efficient mechanism for reviewing how mental patients are treated in hospital. I suggest to the Minister that that is a better mechanism. Giving people a right of appeal to the commission is far better than resorting to common law.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West criticised our suggestion on the ground that it would place an awful bureaucratic burden on hospitals. That is wrong. I do not think that he understands how funds are managed now. New clause 1 states:

"Where the managers of a hospital exercise their powers under subsection (3A) . . . they shall submit regular reports in writing".

I hope that I shall be able to prove that that is not a bureaucratic burden. There is already a variety of ways in which the finances of a mentally incapable adult can be managed in Scotland. Indeed, it is probably the fragmented and archaic nature of those mechanisms, and the fact that they can fail to provide an adequate remedy in many common situations, that have prompted that widespread call for wholesale reform of the law governing them to which my hon. Friend referred. However, I shall not go down that route.

The management of a mentally incapacitated person's affairs is usually separate from the management of his personal welfare. Different types of managers have powers to take care of each of those aspects, and financial managers are appointed to deal with patients' financial affairs. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West should therefore not try to state that giving people in hospital a right to appeal and requiring a report to be made not later than 18 months after their discharge from hospital would place a bureaucratic burden on hospital management, affect patients' treatment or bog down the health service.

Under section 94 of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984, hospital patients liable to be detained under that Act or who are receiving treatment for their mental disorders can have their funds administered by the management of the hospital. There is no equivalent legislation authorising the managers of other care establishments to manage the finances or property of incapable residents. Recent investigations by the Mental Welfare Commission suggest that most incapable patients whose funds are managed by the hospital suffer from chronic schizophrenia, learning disability or dementia. They have usually been in hospital for a number of years, and most do not have contact with relatives.

All that is required for the hospital to take over management of a patient's funds is for the responsible medical officer to state that, in his opinion, the patient is incapable of managing or administering his property and affairs by reason of his mental disorder. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West questioned the adequacy or ability of the responsible medical officer to make that judgment, but who else could make it? That has to be a medical decision. It cannot be taken by an accountant, a banker or by the hospital's financial managers.

Mr. Swayne: With the greatest respect to my right hon. Friend, that is fatuous nonsense. Many people are inadequate at managing their financial affairs, but they do not require a medical officer's certificate saying so.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is missing the point. He is, of course, right to say that many people who are not detained in mental hospitals under the mental health legislation make a mess of managing their finances. Many people's financial affairs are not as good as they should be. My wife says as much to me every month when the bank statement arrives. Perhaps I should not visit Scotland, but neither there nor in England have I been detained under the mental health legislation—much to the consternation, sometimes, of hon. Members on both sides of the House. My point is that the treatment of a person detained under the mental health legislation must be left to the judgment of doctors. I am sure that my hon. Friend accepts that.

A doctor judges whether a person with chronic schizophrenia, dementia or some other disability is capable of leading a safe life in the community, or whether he or she must be detained in a mental hospital. Surely the doctor, therefore, is also the only one who can decide whether that person—given that he or she is unable to live an ordinary life without support from the medical services in hospital—is capable of managing his or her finances. I cannot think of anyone else able to make a judgment of the mental ability of another human being. I do not want to elaborate further on that point but, having dealt with it now, I may be able to speak more briefly about one of the other amendments.

The powers available to hospital managers under section 94 of the 1984 Act, which the Bill would amend, are limited to receiving and holding money and valuables and expending them for the patient's benefit. As I understand it, hospital managers must have regard to any sentimental value that an article may have or would have had to the patient, but for his mental disorder which results in him no longer being able to make a judgment on such sentimental value. However, no further statutory guidance on how those powers can be exercised is given.

There have been concerns that staff feel that to spend money on certain patients would be to waste it and that, consequently, no great effort should be made to ensure that all income available to the patient is claimed or that any money received should be preserved instead of being used to enhance the patient's quality of life. On the other hand, it appears that, in some cases, the money was being used to purchase goods or services that would normally be provided by the national health service. I will not go back to the Crosby report 1985, but that made various recommendations on how to deal with that problem. The new clauses and amendments that I and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst have tabled deal with such worries and concerns.

If we grant under new clause 4 the right of "any person" to appeal to the Mental Welfare Commission against decisions, it would give the detained person such a right, as it would family, friends or other relatives. The terminology "any person" would also give concerned bodies and individuals, boards of visitors and organisations such as MIND the right to take up cases that they think appropriate. I accept the downside that, theoretically, some nosey parkers with no right whatever—they may have a caring interest in the patient but no familial or financial interest—could be given the right to interfere and appeal to the Mental Welfare Commission. I have had to make a judgment on how grave is that risk. I think that it would be very slight.

I am not suggesting that the commission must take action in every case and is bound by the person who appeals to it to do so. It must of course consider the case, but if it concludes that the person who is appealing has no locus or ground and that the appeal is a load of nonsense, it is not bound to proceed. Indeed, there may be the odd occasion when, no doubt, a nosey parker with no other right raises a good point in caring about someone's mental welfare which has not been previously considered.

When I used the terminology "any person" in new clause 4 and elsewhere, it was deliberate because I was afraid that if I tried to define who might have a specific and good reason for such an appeal, I would limit the range of those who would be able to appeal and miss some who had a perfect right to do so.

I would be happy if the Minister said that the terminology was too wide and that there is a list or schedule already in some Act that I could not find of people who may have that right and that it covered everybody. I would accept that and amend my amendments accordingly. The right of appeal is on the expenditure of money or disposal of valuables. That would deal with the concerns of staff and others that sometimes inappropriate judgments have been made on spending patients' money or getting rid of their valuables.

I thought that I would address new clause 4 first in order to try to reassure my hon. Friends who are hostile to its intent. In new clause 1, I suggest that hospital managers must make regular reports in writing to the Mental Welfare Commission. I do not need to explain any further why the commission is the best body to which the report should be made, suffice it to say that it already exists and clearly plays a valuable role in Scotland.

Such a requirement would not impose a heavy burden on financial managers who would have to exercise the responsibility. They have to keep accounts and records in any case. They need not call a case study group to discuss the patient. They already have to keep records of how much is spent and on what it is spent. I am suggesting that all that be combined into a short report to the Mental Welfare Commission, showing what judgments have been made. I do not envisage that that would be a heavy burden on financial managers. It is not a burden on medical staff or doctors; they are not the ones who do it.

New clause 1 states:

"(2) A report under subsection (1) shall be submitted no later than 18 months after the discharge from hospital of the patient concerned, and thereafter on an annual basis, until such time as either—

(a) the patient is considered by the medical officer in charge of his case to be capable of adequately managing and administering his property and affairs".

That is eminently sensible. I shall not try to persuade my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West that the medical officer is the appropriate person. If he wishes to tell me of someone better, I might be persuaded.

There is another important point that none of my hon. Friends has dealt with. New clause 1 says that reports shall be submitted until either the patient is considered to be capable of adequately administering his property and affairs or

My hon. Friends will ask why I have picked a curator bonis instead of any other system. "Curator bonis" is wonderful Scottish terminology. It is one of those examples where Scots law, based on Roman Dutch law, has something to give the United Kingdom, if only we were wise enough to take some parts of it and if only Scotland were wise enough not to go its own way. However, that is another route, which we shall not take today.

A curator bonis can be appointed to manage the assets and affairs of a person over 16 who lacks the capacity to manage his own financial affairs. It is highly relevant—which is why I have put it in new clause 1—because it is the most widely used general legal procedure for managing the funds of a mentally incapacitated person. As I said in introducing my remarks, Scotland has a wealth of means of managing the affairs of people in hospital, or of people generally who may be incapacitated. I have discussed the hospital management system; the curator bonis is the most widely used alternative.

The curatory—that is, the appointment of a curator—can often be the default mechanism. A local authority must apply to the court to appoint a curator if no one else is doing so, and a curator should then be appointed. A curator is a specific type of judicial factor, which is a general term for a person appointed by the court to do something on behalf of another person. Applications to appoint a curator bonis are to the Court of Session or the sheriff court in Scotland, and must be supported by two medical certificates saying that the person is of unsound mind. The incapacitated person or his relatives are entitled to oppose the petition. I hope that two medical certificates saying that a person is of unsound mind would be satisfactory to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West, and that he will not criticise that aspect of new clause 1.

Curators bonis are under the supervision of the accountant of the court, to whom they must submit annual accounts for audit. Without trying to be arrogant, I believe that this is where my new clause is quite clever, in that, by picking a curator bonis and saying that managers must submit annual reports, I am trying to impose on the managers of hospitals a burden similar to that which curators bonis currently have. That is also why I put curators bonis in my new clause. Curators bonis are remunerated for their efforts and are usually professional people, such as solicitors. I shall return to that.

On appointment, a curator automatically supersedes hospital management, any Department of Social Security appointees and most other managers under specific statutory provisions. However, a curator is, in turn, superseded by the appointment of a tutor-at-law, if that happens. It is relevant for me to explain briefly to the House about curators bonis because, even if we have the hospital management system, if a curator bonis is appointed he automatically outranks the hospital management and takes over from it.

We now come to what some of my hon. Friends who are not lawyers may consider to be a downside. Most curators bonis are solicitors, and most of them do not work for free. Indeed, it is said that curators can be expensive. The Law Society of Scotland will no doubt justify that and write letters to colleagues and to myself, which I shall pick up and read in good time if I have got it wrong. The funds of the ward must cover the court petition to appoint the curator, his on-going remuneration—which is determined annually by the accountant of the court on a percentage basis with the aid of complex tables—the annual audit costs and the costs of any further court applications to authorise particular actions by the curator.

It is now generally recognised that curators should not be appointed for estates of less than about £50,000. It is uneconomic to do so. I assume, without going into the details, lawyers' fees will amount to £49,000 on an estate of less than £50,000. That is the underlying message that I receive from the information that I have dug out in my studies.

New clause 1 therefore suggests that annual reports will be submitted by the financial managers of mental hospitals. That would mirror the present requirements of curators bonis.

Mr. Swayne: That would be the exact mirroring of what the curator bonis would achieve. My right hon. Friend has given us a taster of what curators bonis would charge for the service. Why should the burden be imposed on hospital managers, who will be expected to undertake it, out of the public purse, for nothing?

Mr. Maclean: The costs of curators bonis are apparently quite high, but that is not purely because they are required to submit an annual report. The annual report and audit are only tiny parts of the legal bill. In any event, I think that a hospital manager, even a highly paid extortionate hospital manager charging for his time, might not charge at the same hourly rate as a solicitor who is a curator bonis. My hon. Friend has used a rather bogus argument to try to suggest that we should not have annual reports from hospital management because one day that might become as expensive as the cost of a curator bonis, bearing in mind all the other things for which the curator bonis is entitled to charge in administering the estate of somebody incapacitated.

I suggest that an annual report should be prepared until such time as the medical officer says that the person is capable or a curator bonis is appointed. If a curator bonis is appointed, there will be an annual report in any event, and it will be costly.

I move on briefly to deal with the other amendments. I do not intend to speak at length because my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst covered them adequately.

Mr. Forth: Only adequately?

Mr. Maclean: More than adequately; that is what I intended to say.

Amendment No. 1 mirrors part of what I seek to do in new clause 4. The amendment reads:

"The managers of a hospital may exercise their powers under this section until such time as either . . . the patient is considered by the medical officer . . . to be capable . . . or . . . a curator bonis is appointed . . . Any person may at any time request that the patient's ability to manage and administer his property and affairs be reviewed by the medical officer in charge of the case."

I rather like the last part of the amendment because it would give any person the right to suggest to the medical officer that the patient's mental capability to administer his own financial affairs should be reviewed.

There may be accidents because we know that at some of the larger mental hospitals, reviews are sometimes not carried out as expeditiously as they should be. Files may be delayed at hospitals dealing with large numbers of patients, or a patient's annual or six-monthly review may not take place when it should. Little hiccups of that sort occur. I am not criticising medical authorities or any particular mental hospitals; I am merely saying that hiccups occur in organisations dealing with tens of thousands of people. The new clause will give any person at any time the right, if he discovers a problem, to say to the medical officer, "Why has case X not yet been reviewed? We think that he is capable of administering his affairs." Organisations such as MIND or other hospital visitors, or visiting psychiatrists or doctors, may think that a case should be reviewed. That is sensible.

The purpose of amendment No. 1 is to ensure that in the case of an incapax patient who has been discharged, whose money is held by hospital managers, and who is subsequently able to deal with his affairs, the amendment would automatically give him the right to assume control of his own assets. It would also guard against the hospital being locked into administering funds in perpetuity. It is a well balanced, even-handed amendment, which prevents the hospital being stuck with administering the funds for ever more, and gives a guarantee to the patient that he can regain control of his assets in the event of him being judged able to administer his own affairs.

I shall deal briefly with amendment No. 2, which was a source of controversy among some of my hon. Friends. If it is accepted, the Bill will read:

"The managers of a hospital may, for a period not exceeding five years following the discharge of the patient, continue to hold money . . . and receive interest . . . and expend money".

The amendment inserts a time limit of five years. The purpose of the amendment is similar to that of new clause 3, which restricts the responsibility of the hospital managers to discharge patients who continue to live within health board boundaries. I cannot discuss that as it was not selected, but the amendment is comparable to that. It prevents managers having to assume an unacceptable administrative burden.

The amendment would place a five-year limit on the time for which hospital managers administer the assets of discharged patients who remain incapax. Some of my hon. Friends consider five years too long. I am not certain whether it is the correct period. However, it is a long-stop provision, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said. There is nothing to stop the hospital managers concluding that the person should have his funds restored before that time. I cannot find the quote from the Scottish Association for Mental Health, which argued for a six-month review period or a six-month time limit. The association certainly argued for a long stop, and the time it suggested was considerably shorter than that proposed in the amendment.

I urge the Minister to consider such a provision. There must be some cut-off point at which the hospital ceases to administer the funds. It cannot be right that the hospital management should continue to administer the affairs of a patient who was discharged 10 or 15 years previously.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Maclean: I must conclude.

Mr. Brady: I shall be brief. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is true not just of funds, but particularly of valuables, which may have sentimental value to the former patient?

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, which leads me nicely into my remarks on amendment No. 5, which deals with valuables and other items that may be of sentimental value.

[Mr. Maclean]

First, however, I shall conclude my remarks on amendment No. 2. There is nothing magical about the five-year period to which the amendment refers, but some limit is necessary. I shall be happy to accept the Minister's advice whether three years is the correct term, or six months or 10 years.

Mr. Forth: The trouble is that we cannot change the amendment now. This is the last gasp of consideration. Unfortunately, the House has put itself in a position where we must accept either the original Bill or some—or, we hope, all—of our amendments and new clauses, but nothing else. My right hon. Friend therefore has a problem. He must stick to his proposed period of five years, or he is not going to have anything at all.

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for pointing out that the Bill cannot go to another place for amendment. Nevertheless, I expect the Minister to say today that he is aware of the point, and that legislation is being prepared for the new Scottish Parliament. That may be the wider Bill for which my right hon. Friend has called, or a Bill to deal with this matter.

I understand that there is a need for further mental health legislation in Scotland with which the Scottish Parliament can deal. I hope that the Minister can reassure me—whether we are talking about a period of two, five or seven years—that legislation will be proposed to deal with the problem. If he sees merit in the proposal, a measure can be introduced here—we will be happy to deal with legislation relating to the Union—or in the Scottish Parliament. I see merit in the proposal, as do my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Essentially, amendment No. 5 is a probing amendment to ensure that the terms used in the Bill, such as "money", adequately cover all assets that an incapax patient may hold. It may be that there is an established precedent for what the terms mean. However, as the Bill extends the powers of hospital managers, it is sensible to ensure that all assets held by the patient are covered.

The Minister can answer my point in one of two ways. He can say that he will propose legislation in either the UK Parliament or the Scottish Parliament, or he can say that the term "money" is defined somewhere else, such as the 1994 Act—although I must confess that I did not spot it—to include bank notes, coins and sums deposited in a bank or building society account. If so, I will be satisfied.

The amendment also lists other forms of financial assets which a person might hold, or acquire via an inheritance. Again, the list is not exclusive, but it covers the most popular forms of non-bank account investments. That is very important. The Minister may tell me not to worry and that the matter is covered in existing legislation, or that the interpretation of the law will be that that is the case.

The amendment states that money, financial assets and investments and valuables

"shall include sums and items inherited by the patient when resident in hospital or subsequent to discharge from hospital."

This is the key part of the amendment. For example, a patient may be left property or money in the will of a deceased relative, or he or she may receive a windfall payment from a building society which has converted to a bank. It is not clear from the Bill if such moneys could be administered by the hospital management. The amendment would ensure that they were covered. I shall not push the amendment to a vote if the Minister can reassure me that this crucial matter is covered.

This morning, we have dealt with Bills concerning human beings. It is terribly important for this Parliament to deal with such measures. The first Bill that we debated today dealt with one human being who may have suffered a terrible injustice, and the House spent two and half hours dealing with it. This afternoon, we are dealing with a Bill relating to individuals who are still alive, but whom medical practitioners have ruled to be incapable and who must be detained in hospital. If they are released, the state has decided that they would be incapable of managing their affairs and that we should run their assets. That is a grave step to take, but it has been taken over the years by various Parliaments which have given powers to medical practitioners to detain people by reason of mental incapacity.

1.30 pm

If we are to have such legislation on the statute book, and if Parliament is to pass this amending Bill—I hope that we shall do so, and I do not intend to prevent that from happening even if the Minister rejects my amendments and new clauses—it is beholden on hon. Members to make sure that they build in all the safeguards they can.

On the selection list, this group of amendments and new clauses has been entitled "Safeguards". I did not choose that title; perhaps it was chosen by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or your office. That is what they are—safeguards for human beings. We are dealing with important legislation this morning and it has been a privilege to discuss provisions that I think may improve it. However, I am willing to be persuaded that the amendments are not necessary or that these matters can be dealt with in the other place. This time, that other place is 300 miles up the road.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I shall be very brief. This group of amendments and new clauses stands in the names of my right hon. Friends the Members for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). I pay genuine tribute to their assiduity—not only today, but on previous Fridays—to the cause of private Members' legislation. They have been subjected to some criticism outside the House, which I think has been wholly misplaced. Some might say that that is a charitable view, because one of the victims of their stern and unbending approach has been a Bill of mine which commends itself to many people inside and outside my constituency and which would correct an offence that literally lingers disagreeably in the nostrils of mankind.

My right hon. Friends' emphasis is on legislation receiving proper scrutiny. It is a truism that we pass too much legislation and that it is insufficiently scrutinised by the House. The Home Secretary had to come to the House recently to confess to a massive omission from the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. Had that omission been exposed by a major terrorist offence between the passing of the Act and the discovery of the omission, it might have occasioned his resignation. It would also have reflected on Parliament as a whole. If that would have been a major setback in the context of terrorism, how much more so are omissions in the context of mental health?

I shall not dwell on the Bill that we debated earlier this morning because you would rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but it was also occasioned by an omission from previous legislation. Relevant to that legislation were the Mental Health Act 1961 (Northern Ireland), the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 and the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. I strongly support the assiduity of my right hon. Friends, who have brought this group of new clauses and amendments to the attention of the House, discussed the cause of mental health and highlighted the interest in the proposals, which has been severally represented to them, of organisations outside the House. That is a riposte to those outside the House who have criticised them for their diligence in respect of legislation of this sort.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): It is an honour to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) and I agree with his remarks about the need to give adequate scrutiny to such Bills, which are so important to people. I emphasise the word "people" and I am glad that we are undertaking that scrutiny. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) has been so assiduous and so comprehensive in his remarks that it is not necessary for me to detain the House for long, except to highlight one or two of the points that I believe need to be made. I support the new clause because it would add to the efficacy of the Bill.

Our debate has concerned the nature of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland and its role. No doubt we will be reassured be the fact that it must

"enquire into any case where it appears to them that such a person's property"— that is, the property of someone covered by the relevant Acts of Parliament—

"may be exposed to loss or damage. It must also notify any hospital or local authority when it considers that they should exercise their functions in order to prevent or redress loss or damage to property. In addition, the MWC has various duties to visit patients who are detained in hospital."

I am absolutely sure that the MWC carries out its duties assiduously, but we are considering conferring extremely wide powers. I think that we should inquire carefully into the extent of those powers, and ensure that the interests of patients—albeit patients who may be very sick, and who may be incapable of running their own affairs—are properly observed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border quoted from a report stating that hospital management provides "a relatively quick and inexpensive method of administering funds and possessions of a modest value. It avoids the cumbersomeness of accounting to, and supervision by, the Accountant of the Court."

No doubt the House will agree that that is a good way of managing the interests of patients, but it must be said that the powers vested in hospital management in regard to patients' funds are extremely wide. The new clauses and amendments contain safeguards to deal with that.

Only one medical certificate is required for a patient's funds to be controlled by hospital management, and there is no opportunity for the certificate to be challenged. There can be no consideration of the evidence in a hearing. Management by a hospital's central managers may be regarded as remote and impersonal. No individual is to be appointed with specific responsibility for the funds of particular patients. It is not clear whether the duty to receive money extends to withdrawing money from a patient's bank or building society account so that it can be spent on the patient's welfare. The current limit of £50,000—which seems to give considerable latitude to those controlling the funds—could appear excessive, given that curators would almost certainly be appointed for mentally incapable people with estates of that size living outside hospital.

Although the powers vested in hospital management in regard to incapable patients are clearly very wide, there is no right of appeal. No one is suggesting that hospitals will set out to mismanage funds; all that my right hon. Friends are suggesting in the new clauses and amendments is that the Bill should allow patients some guarantee, and some right of redress against hospital managers who fail to administer their finances in their best interests. Such cases may be rare, but it should be borne in mind that we are not necessarily thinking in terms of purely financial mismanagement. Sentimental value may well attach especially to articles, but perhaps even to funds of some sort, and hospitals may take insufficient account of that.

"expend that money or dispose of those valuables for the benefit of that person and in the exercise of the powers conferred by this subsection the managers shall have regard to the sentimental value that any article may have for the patient, or would have but for his mental disorder."

We all know that it might be extremely difficult for hospital managers, given their wide powers, to reach a definite conclusion that was fair in terms of the sentimental value of any given article. I see no harm in providing for an annual report of the kind envisaged in new clause 1, enabling the way in which hospital management runs a patient's affairs to be laid down in print, and enabling the patient's family to be reassured about what is going on.

There are a number of concerns about the Bill, which are made even more pertinent by the extension of the powers of hospital management for which it provides. We need a precise definition of "benefit to the patient"; no doubt the Minister will be able to help us in that regard. If a manager spends money for the benefit of the patient, what rights will the patient's family have if they disagree with the expenditure, or with any part of it? Perhaps the Minister will be able to reassure us about this. At present, hospital management and the Mental Welfare Commission can work with the family, but what rights will the family have? It seems that, under existing legislation and under the Bill as proposed, they have few rights.

In the event of such a disagreement, what provision is there for arbitration? As an associate member of the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators, I take an interest in arbitration. I hope, if all goes well with various exams, to become a fellow of the institute. There is no mention of arbitration in the Bill. After all, in virtually every other dispute, people can either take the matter to a court of law, or it is laid down in a contract, or in agreements within the business that disputes will be referred to arbitration.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend may recall that, earlier in the debate, someone—I forget who—pointed out that the Minister had said, and I find it almost beyond belief, that people should not worry because, if anything went wrong, they could resort to the common law, to the courts, to put it right. With his obvious expertise in and commitment to the principle of arbitration, does my hon. Friend agree that the amendments are far preferable to forcing people, especially those who are perhaps vulnerable, to resort to the courts for a fair hearing?

Mr. Leigh: I am grateful for that intervention. The whole point of arbitration is to provide an inexpensive alternative to court procedures, which are cumbersome and long-winded, and to which it is difficult for ordinary members of the public to have access. Given the cases that we are talking about, where I doubt that large sums of money will be involved, where people may be of very modest means and mentally incapable, I do not think that people will go to common law.

I would much rather have a Bill that set out a safeguard in clear terms. What the Bill proposes is right. Of course, there should be a procedure by which the affairs of a patient who goes into the community can be managed properly, but the amendments propose that there should also be a safeguard for the family—some right of redress, some right of appeal, some written report to which they can refer. As I understand it—I may be wrong; perhaps the Minister can reassure me—there is none at present. That is not fair.

By requiring hospital managers to submit regular reports to the Mental Welfare Commission, by allowing the relatives, or guardians of patients to have access to those reports, and by providing the right of appeal against decisions of the managers, we will put those safeguards in place. They would strengthen the Bill, not weaken it. I hope that the Minister and the promoter of the Bill will accept the amendments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): I acknowledge the supportive nature of all the amendments to the general thrust of the Bill and the supportive nature of the comments made so far in the debate. I welcome the good wishes that have been extended to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), which I warmly endorse. I also welcome the role of my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams), who is acting as the promoter of the Bill.

I appreciate the underlying sentiments of new clause 1. It deals with the welfare of the person concerned and the importance of avoiding any impropriety in handling his or her affairs.

A number of arrangements, or checks and balances are already in place, which will help to ensure that the resources in question are used to the optimum benefit of the patient. For example, section 94(2) of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 already requires hospital managers to obtain the consent of the Mental Welfare Commission to administer the funds of incapacitated persons where such funds are in excess of a figure agreed by the First Minister. Currently, that figure is £5,000. It follows, therefore, that in any such case the commission will be aware of the existence of those funds and could at any time in the exercise of its protective function under the 1984 Act make inquiries about the use of the resources in question. If, for example, there was a suggestion of improper use, it could bring the matter to the attention of the First Minister, the health board concerned or any other relevant body.

Secondly, and in addition to the procedure that I have just mentioned, the commission has asked hospital managers to obtain its consent to any single or cumulative item or items of expenditure purchased from a patient's capital exceeding £500 in any one year. That figure is kept under regular review and was set at £500 on 1 April this year.

Thirdly, such expenditure on a person's behalf will be subject to scrutiny by the auditors. Any irregularity or improper use could also be detected in that way.

Fourthly, hospital managers already notify the commission of all cases in which they are managing the resources of patients in hospital under section 94. The commission, in turn, already examines in the course of its hospital visits whether the powers under section 94 are being properly exercised and whether the resources of the patients concerned are being managed to their satisfaction.

By way of reassurance to the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), the Scottish Executive has made it clear that it will ensure that in the administrative guidance that will follow the enactment of the Bill, hospital managers are asked to notify the commission of all cases in which they are managing the resources of persons who want to live in the community. The commission will also be invited to include those persons in the scrutiny that it already undertakes under section 94 arrangements.

Finally, as my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), the then Minister, made clear on Second Reading, the new Administration in Scotland is about to issue new guidance on managing the resources of incapacitated patients who live in the community. That will provide clear guidance to hospital managers on the how the resources that they are managing can best be used to benefit the patient concerned. A number of safeguards are already in place and I understand that they operate to everyone's satisfaction. Those safeguards will be extended to all new cases that come within the scope of the Bill.

New clause 4 would introduce a right of appeal for persons who leave hospital to live in the community and continue to have their funds looked after by the managers of the hospital that they have left. The appeal, which could be raised by any person, could be against the continuing management of such a person's resources by the hospital or against the way in which their money and valuables have been managed. Currently, no formal right of appeal is available to patients in hospital under section 94 of the 1984 Act, but as hon. Members have acknowledged and as one might expect, hospital managers go about their task with diligence, thoughtfulness and care. A range of safeguards is already in place, some of which I described in my reply to new clause 1.

If, however, there was evidence that hospital managers were continuing unnecessarily to manage the funds of a person or that they were expending his or her funds inappropriately, at common law that person could make an application for the return of those funds at any time. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I ask hon. Members to contain their disappointment until I have finished this point.

Patients can apply for the return of their funds at any time if it is apparent that they have recovered the capacity to manage their own affairs. That is an important protection and should be acknowledged as such. If hospital managers refuse to accede to such an application, they will be open to judicial review.

Similarly, if it emerged that hospital managers were inappropriately disposing of a person's resources, redress could be sought in the courts. That facility would apply regardless of whether the person was in hospital or had left hospital to live in the community.

Mr. Luff: The Minister is raising one of the precise issues that I raised in my speech. The remedies that he is suggesting are very expensive, but would affect only small sums. Judicial review in such cases would, frankly, be preposterous.

Mr. Macdonald: The point that I was about to make is that there are other forms of protection. Nevertheless, it is important to note that common law protection is available—as is the possibility of judicial review, which is an important but not the only safeguard. It would also be open to the person, or to someone on his or her behalf, to ask the Mental Welfare Commission to investigate any suggestion of impropriety, or other shortcomings, in the handling of the person's property.

I assure hon. Members that the commission has wide-ranging powers to investigate complaints, which can come from any person—including, of course, relatives. I therefore do not think that new clause 4 is necessary. There are already sufficient powers, both at common law and—in the 1984 Act—in the Mental Welfare Commission's powers, to ensure that a person's property being managed by the hospital is adequately protected. With that assurance, I hope that hon. Members will not press new clause 4 to a Division.

We believe that amendment No. 2 is also unnecessary. As has been made clear in the Scottish Parliament—and mentioned in this debate by the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne)—it is proposed to introduce, in the autumn, an incapable adults Bill that will provide for a comprehensive new system for dealing with the finances of incapable adults. It is envisaged that the Bill—subject, of course, to the wishes of the Scottish Parliament—would be enacted and operational well within five years. In that case, hospital managers' responsibility for persons who leave hospital to live in the community should essentially cease—so that amendment No. 2 would have no practical effect. I therefore hope that hon. Members will also be persuaded not to press that amendment.

As for amendment No. 1, section 94 of the 1984 Act already requires the medical officer responsible for the patient's treatment to state that that person is incapable of managing his affairs. The section also makes it clear that, when a curator bonis is appointed, hospital managers' responsibility ceases. In the course of the regular medical assessments that a patient in hospital will receive, the doctor will normally determine whether the patient remains incapable of managing his or her affairs. When capacity has been regained, clearly, the responsibility of the hospital manager will terminate. The same applies to patients living in the community.

I recognise, however, the importance of regular medical reviews—which is perhaps the underlying point of the amendment. It is therefore proposed that—in a guidance circular to hospital managers and other interested parties that will follow the Bill's enactment—stress will be placed on the importance of conducting regular assessments of the person's condition, whether in hospital or the community, to determine the person's capacity or otherwise to manage his or her own affairs.

It would also be open to any person at any time—as the amendment envisages—to request that a patient's condition be reviewed. That point will be covered in the proposed circular, to ensure that hospital managers are clear that, when an approach is made on behalf of a person in that regard, it is duly honoured in exactly the way intended by the amendment.

In addition, good practice guidance, which the Scottish Executive plans to issue in the near future on the management of incapacitated patients' funds, will stress the importance of regular checks on patients' capacity, whether in hospital or in the community. With that assurance that the point will be incorporated in circulars and guidance, I hope that hon. Members will not press that amendment to a vote, either.

I do not think that amendment No. 5 would be helpful. The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) said that it was intended as a probing amendment to discover the meaning of the terminology. One of the chief merits of the Bill is its simplicity and the neat solution that it proposes to a pressing problem: the current legal impediment that prevents hospital managers from releasing funds when a patient leaves hospital. We need to retain the general thrust of section 94 of the 1984 Act, which this Bill amends. Section 94 refers specifically to money and valuables. For the time being, there is no need to depart from that simple terminology, which allows hospital managers to adopt a flexible, common-sense approach to their responsibilities for the resources of persons in their care.

The Bill is already designed to deal with money and valuables held by hospital managers, or interest accruing on those. It is not envisaged that, after a patient goes back into the community, new money, for example from pensions, will be managed by the hospital manager. Arrangements for the new money will be made in the normal way. For example, the new carer or a Department of Social Security appointee will manage moneys received after the patient is discharged from hospital.

Before a patient goes back into the community, the hospital and social workers plan that discharge and make arrangements for the patient's welfare. Planning for management of the patient's income is part of that task. Arrangements are often made for pensions and similar regular payments to be paid to someone on the patient's behalf—generally a DSS appointee or some other appointed person.

[Mr. Macdonald]

Obviously, one would expect that, where a patient had a large financial portfolio, a curator bonis would be appointed, or other arrangements made, to look after such assets. There is, however, flexibility in the provisions for hospital managers to exercise discretion on the approach to those matters. It is important that that flexibility be allowed to continue.

If there is a case for change, we would all agree that it would be best dealt with within the larger canvas of the incapable adults Bill, which is being prepared for the Scottish Parliament. I therefore urge that the amendment be withdrawn.

I hope that none of the amendments will be pressed to a vote. Although they contain some good points, the Scottish Executive has given assurances that they will now be incorporated in new guidance.

Mr. Forth: May I express my gratitude and appreciation for the typically courteous manner in which the Minister has replied to the debate? He has dealt with the material seriously and has gone out of his way to deal with the matter fully and courteously, which is not always the case in Friday debates. I do not, therefore, want to be unhelpful.

I much appreciated the detailed reply that the Minister gave on new clause 1, as it reassured us that the worries that we expressed can be dealt with in a number of different ways, and not necessarily as described in the new clause. The hon. Gentleman went out of his way to identify how that could be done, which was reassuring.

I was worried about the Minister's response to new clause 4, until he reached his punch line. He spoke about resorting to the courts and judicial review, which most of us feel would not be of much use to the individuals in question.

When the Minister said that the commission could always hold an investigation, that must have reassured everyone other than members of the Law Society of Scotland, who must be worrying that we are trying to steer people away from Scottish lawyers; but that is their problem.

I was slightly less happy with the Minister's response to amendment No. 2. He said that everything was to be reviewed and changed, so it would all be okay. He seemed almost to be giving a commitment on behalf of a completely different institution. I do not know whether he feels that he can speak on behalf of Members of the Scottish Parliament, but as he has been so forthcoming, I am willing to accept his reassurances in good faith. He has good contacts with MSPs and I am sure that he exercises some influence over them, so on this occasion we can accept that the matter will be dealt with, as it now properly should be, north of the border.

The Minister went even further on amendment No. 1 and said specifically that a circular of guidance would be issued that reflects the anxieties expressed today and puts in place the mechanisms that our new clauses and amendments were designed to achieve. As a result of what he has said, of his courtesy and of his having taken such trouble to deal with these matters, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

PROPERTY OF FORMER PATIENTS

Mr. Maclean: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 1, leave out lines 9 to 11 and insert—

'(a) hold, and receive interest accruing thereon, money, other financial assets and investments, and valuables on behalf of a person in pursuance of subsection (1) of this section, and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 4, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(3B) If the value of other financial assets and investments and valuables held by the managers of a hospital under the provisions of subsection (3A) of this section exceeds £5,000 then the administration of the patient's financial portfolio shall be passed to an independent financial adviser or professional, or curator bonis appointed by the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland.'.

Mr. Maclean: I apologise to the House, as it was remiss of me not to mention the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), the Bill's promoter, and the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams), for whom I have the utmost respect. She is a very brave lady who has had a lot to put up with over the past few years. I congratulate her on piloting the Bill through today.

I hope that the Minister will be as courteous and as kind as he was in our previous discussion. He does not have a job in the Scottish Executive, but he will always be welcome in the House on a Friday, because of his demeanour and his approach.

Amendment No. 3 is designed to probe the definition of money that hospital managers may hold and expend on behalf of discharged patients. Following the terminology used in section 94, the Bill refers to hospital managers dealing with money or "valuables". "Valuables" would normally mean items such as a ring, watch or camera. That is what one feels the legislation means.

The amendment would add other assets and investments, to ensure that patients with holdings, however small, in forms other than cash or bank or building society accounts, do not fall outside the scope of the legislation. Those assets might not be "valuables" in the hospital administrator's sense of the term.

I accept that in practice there may be very few patients with such investments, but it is sensible to clarify the position. A patient could be left in a will a financial asset other than money deposited in a bank or building society. The amendment would allow such assets to be included in the property that can be administered by hospital managers. I suspect that the Minister may tell me that the definition of money would include those assets anyway, but it is better to be sure that such moneys are covered.

Amendment No. 4 is slightly different; its purpose is to ensure that if assets held by a discharged patient exceed £5,000 in value, the administration of the assets shall be carried out by a financial adviser or other suitable professional appointed by the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland.

The amendment would guarantee that hospital managers did not become unduly burdened by having to administer assets of great value. There may be cases in which curators bonis deal with assets that are not of great monetary value, since it seems that they should be appointed to administer only those estates that are worth over £50,000. What about estates between £20,000 and £50,000?

I suggest that hospital managers should not have to administer any estate worth more than £5,000. I hope that if the Minister does not like that idea, at least my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) will, because he cannot complain that I am trying to put an undue burden on hospital managers. My amendment suggests that some other suitably qualified professional should be appointed.

That would also be in the best interests of patients. If assets are of considerable value, the ways in which they are invested can have a material effect on the financial returns that they earn. It is the job of a financial manager in a hospital to manage small sums and ensure that they are in a building society account earning whatever interest is available at the time. Someone with larger assets should have a more qualified professional, such as an investment manager appointed by the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland, to ensure that those assets are deposited in the right sort of accounts, or used to acquire the right sort of bonds, stocks and shares, and trust funds, to give the best possible return. It is not a hospital manager's job to make such decisions.

My amendment would pass such responsibility to an independent professional appointed by the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland. I chose the trigger value of £5,000 because if an incapax patient in hospital has more assets than that, the managers must obtain the consent of the commission before they can administer the funds. Scottish law already recognises that if hospital managers are investing funds of more than £5,000, they have to consult the commission as an appeal or regulatory body. I suggest that such matters should be taken out of the managers' hands and given to a financial adviser appointed by the commission.

In practice there may be very few such patients, and if the Minister tells me that the problem is already dealt with, or that there will be guidance, or that the problem will be dealt with in the new legislation now being designed in Scotland to cover mentally incapable adults, I should be happy to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Macdonald: I hope that I can provide some of the reassurance that the right hon. Gentleman seeks. At present, section 94 of the 1984 Act, which applies to patients in hospital, provides for hospital managers to assume the management of money and valuables where no other arrangements have been made. Money and valuables are not defined; that is a benefit, and it works adequately to allow hospital managers the flexibility to do what is in the best interests of patients. Typically, money can include a variety of resources, including income from pensions, bank accounts and so on.

Amendment No. 4 would give the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland the responsibility of appointing an independent financial adviser, other professional or curator bonis when a person discharged from hospital into the community has financial assets and valuables exceeding £5,000 in value.

At present, hospital managers require the consent of the Mental Welfare Commission to hold money or valuables on behalf of any person where the total value exceeds the sum determined by the First Minister. That sum currently stands at £5,000. There is already power under the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 for the commission to appoint a curator bonis where no other suitable arrangements for the management of someone's resources have been made.

Amendment No. 4 would limit the very useful flexibility that the commission currently enjoys by requiring it to appoint a financial adviser or curator bonis in cases when it would still be perfectly acceptable for hospital managers to continue to look after a person's assets. It has been pointed out that administration of a person's assets can be expensive, and that the costs must be met from that person's resources. The judgment in each person's case is best left to the commission, as the people involved benefit from the flexibility that individual judgments provide. I hope that the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border will accept that that flexibility protects the interests of the patient, and should therefore be retained.

Mr. Maclean: I listened carefully to the Minister. I am always worried that the Minister's fundamental courtesy will beguile me into accepting his point of view even though I profoundly disagree with him. I am grateful for his acknowledgement that the amendments are designed to improve the Bill.

I have no intention of pressing amendments that would remove flexibility. I accept the Minister's arguments about amendment No. 4. If I had drafted it differently, to include the hospital authority among the possible appointees of the commission, it might have been more acceptable. My naive intention, having read that the curator bonis can be quite an expensive option, was that appointing another financial adviser might be cheaper. Given that bank charges are rising inexorably, a banker or stock broker might levy even higher charges than a curator bonis.

I accept the Minister's warning that amendment No. 4 would reduce flexibility. I also accept his assurances, in connection with amendment No. 3, that the provision covering money and valuables is widely drafted and can include all sorts of valuables, over and above the few bits and bobs in people's handbags, suitcases or pockets when they go into hospital.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

CITATION, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 19, leave out 'two' and insert 'six'.

I hope that we can deal with this matter quickly. It is familiar territory for the House to give some consideration to a Bill's commencement period. In this case, I believe that it may be sensible to allow a somewhat longer period of time than is usual for commencement, simply to ensure that the mechanisms that the Bill introduces are firmly in place before it takes effect.

Undue haste in implementing the Bill is the last thing that we want, given that we are dealing with such sensitive and important matters. I accept that this matter involves a balance of judgment, but I thought it appropriate to facilitate a brief exchange on the commencement period to establish whether the Minister was completely satisfied that all the managers on whom responsibilities will be placed will have sufficient opportunity to put the required mechanisms in place.

That is the objective behind the amendment. It is an important detail, and one worth consideration even at this late stage in our proceedings. I hope that the Minister will reassure me that he is satisfied that those on whom the new responsibilities will fall will be ready for them within the relatively short commencement period specified in the Bill.

Mr. Swayne: I do not see any reason for this amendment. It should be rejected. No one could accuse us of giving this Bill peremptory treatment or implementing it too speedily. It is supported by 11 Scottish Members of Parliament, two of whom are also Members of the Scottish Parliament, which is in recess. Any reservation on their part would have been quite properly expressed.

It is quite appropriate for this House to proceed to enact the Bill without reference to any other Parliament or having to require authority from anywhere else. That is entirely within the spirit of the Scotland Act 1998. I do not believe for one moment that there is a Member of Parliament from Scotland in the House who would urge that we do anything other than reject the amendment.

2.15 pm

Mr. Macdonald: I hope that I can assure Members that two months is adequate time to gear up in the way that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) suggests. It is the normal amount of time, as hon. Members know. It will allow all necessary guidance to be issued to hospital managers, and allow them to make all necessary arrangements to implement the Act.

The reason for the Bill is that the pace of the on-going move of people from hospital into community care in Scotland is picking up. So, over coming months, significant numbers of people will be affected by the anomaly that the Bill addresses. For that reason, we would not wish to delay the Act's implementation beyond two months.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Minister. I readily accept his balance of judgment that the urgency of dealing with the number of cases outweighs any possible reservations about the speed with which the measures in the Bill can be implemented. Given his reassurance and balance of judgment, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

2.17 pm

Mrs. Irene Adams (Paisley, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have reached the concluding stages of this Bill in its voyage through the House. On Second Reading, the winds were all favourable and excellent progress was made. In Committee, there was just a hint in the comments of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) that there could be some squalls ahead. Indeed, on Report earlier today, the winds blew rather strongly.

I thank the right hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) for their well-intentioned and well-drafted amendments and for graciously withdrawing them in the light of the comments of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland. I am glad to say that the Bill has emerged unscathed into what I hope can be calmer waters.

I again pay tribute to the skilful piloting of the Bill through its earlier stages by my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke). It is a great honour for me to assume the badge of temporary pilot during its remaining stages, but it is in my hon. Friend's direction that all the credit must go. We all wish him a speedy recovery.

This is not a large Bill. However, we know that good things often come in small packages and, despite its size, it has the potential to make a big difference to the lives of some of our most unfortunate and disadvantaged fellow citizens. It addresses the gap in the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984 which deprives a growing number of people of the benefits of their own funds when they leave hospital. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have warmly endorsed its passage so far. On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, I seek their further support in giving the Bill a Third Reading.

I commend the Bill to the House.

2.20 pm

Mr. McLoughlin: The Opposition welcome the Bill and commend those who have introduced it. I join the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) in congratulating and wishing a speedy recovery to the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke).

The Bill is a classic example of a well thought out and sensible measure that commands support from both sides of the House, so it is properly suited to private Members' business. It has been carefully scrutinised as a result of the thoughtful amendments that have been tabled and considered this morning. The Bill, being so well drafted, survived that process exceptionally well.

By allowing hospital managers not only to receive money and valuables for a person who is liable to be detained and who is being treated in the hospital, but to continue to hold and spend such funds on such patients after they leave hospital, the Bill will ensure that such moneys can be used for their benefit and are not trapped when the patient starts to reside in the community. As care in the community is to be encouraged where feasible, it is obviously most desirable that this change should be implemented.

The Bill is also noteworthy because the House is legislating on a matter that became devolved to the Scottish Parliament on 1 July 1999—although the devolution rules did provide that legislation introduced before that date could complete its course through the Westminster Parliament. If there had been any resistance from the Scottish Parliament to our continuing to consider the measure, the official Opposition would have been reluctant to lend support to the Bill today. However, it is clear that MSPs of all parties, and the official bodies—such as the Law Society of Scotland—that supported the Bill initially, all want the Bill to complete its passage through this place and remove from the Scottish Parliament the burden of passing identical legislation later.

The Bill therefore stands as an example of post-devolution co-operation between both Parliaments. That fact makes it doubly welcome, and we are happy to give it our support today.

Mr. Macdonald: My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), ably assisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams), has done an excellent job of steering the Bill safely to this point.

The Government have been delighted to support the Bill. It will make a welcome contribution to the welfare of a growing number of people who are unable, due to incapacity, to look after their own affairs after leaving hospital to live in the community. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian will be able to look back with no little pride on this piece of legislation, which we have come to know as the Clarke Bill, and which I hope will shortly become the Clarke Act.

2.23 pm

Mr. Forth: I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) when he pointed out that this, in many ways, is a model private Member's Bill. It is a brief Bill. It covers a specific point. As the Minister pointed out, it has a degree of urgency about it. It has passed through its successive stages in the House in a proper manner. It came high in the ballot. It received a Second Reading and was considered in Committee, and we have given it a thorough examination on Report.

The hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams) was kind enough to acknowledge that the amendments that I and my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) tabled were designed either to improve the Bill or to get from the Minister the reassurances that, happily, we have got. We have now found out that one of the results of that will be the issue of a circular of guidance, which, in the Minister's view, will strengthen the Bill's provisions. I agree with him. Therefore, the net result of our deliberations, today in particular, has been to strengthen the Bill—as the Minister and the hon. Lady were kind enough to acknowledge. All in all, we can feel satisfied that the proceedings of the House have been properly conducted and have been productive and a force for good. That is as it should be.

Most of the reservations that I had about the Bill, on which I reflected briefly in Committee, have now been put to one side. In cases such as this we always hope that any fears that we may have had will prove groundless; that the additional burdens, if I may put it that way, or obligations that are imposed by this type of legislation, however limited it may seem in scope, can be handled by those responsible; and that it will enhance and protect the well-being of the group at which the legislation is aimed. I believe that on balance that is the case. We have heard from the Law Society of Scotland and from other organisations that have been involved, and it would be appropriate to give the Bill our final approval. We should then keep more than half an eye on the indications that the Minister has given that matters will be carried forward in a Scottish context.

I am delighted to see that the Secretary of State for Scotland is on the Treasury Front Bench to keep a close eye on us and to perform the bridging function that he told us recently he will be performing between what we have done in this place as perhaps a last goodbye to Scottish legislative matters, and the Scottish Parliament. All in all, I think that the Bill will represent an improvement. The House can be happy with it.

2.26 pm

Mr. Maclean: I am pleased to add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) on his early piloting of the Bill through the House. I congratulate also the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mrs. Adams), whom I have already commended for her courage in her constituency and for the skilful way in which she has piloted the Bill today. It is important particularly that I congratulate the Minister. He paid tribute to his hon. Friends and to my right hon. and hon. Friends and me for the quality of our amendments, which is rather flattering. He was either making that up or it was in his notes from his officials, in which case I am glad that we were able to impress Scottish Office officials with the quality of our drafting.

Some of our amendments were designed as probing amendments, but I would genuinely have wished to see others of them inserted in the Bill. Given the Minister's assurances that matters were already in hand or that the matters we were raising were already covered somewhere in the Bill, or that he would take up our suggestions and issue guidance and codes of practice, for example, he persuaded us not to proceed with our amendments.

I hold out the Minister as an example to be followed by some other Ministers, perhaps from south of the border, who come to the House on Fridays and become rather impatient or intolerant when they do not get their Bills through in 10 minutes flat, without Members considering them in any detail. The Bills that have come before us today have been given proper consideration.

I hope that Labour Back-Bench Members will not get too annoyed with the rest of the Government when their precious Bills are ruthlessly destroyed by the Government in a few minutes' time. It is of great regret to me that we shall not be able to consider those matters properly, as we have considered the Bill. That is because the Government have given the poisoned chalice to those nice guys from the Government Whips Office, who have to kill off legislation that the Government find intolerable.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I thought that the Bill was good and that is why we supported it. We thought that it could be improved slightly but we were willing to accept the guidance not only of the Minister, but of the Scottish Association for Mental Health, which welcomed the Bill. It said that it was "a small improvement to an unacceptable situation."

It spoke of the need for safeguards, and I thought that it was worth while pursuing that point. However, I was happy to back down in the light of the Minister's assurances.

[Mr. Maclean]

The Law Society of Scotland is also in favour of the provisions of the Bill, stating that it will

"solve a problem that is affecting a substantial number of former hospital residents in Scotland."

The society has urged Members to support the Bill. The Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland also welcomes the Bill.

In these circumstances, I am happy to see the Bill pass into law. I congratulate all who have been associated with getting it this far. I hope that the measure is successful in Scotland in the coming months once it is legislation.

2.29 pm

Mrs. Irene Adams: We have had a short but interesting debate and there remains little to be said. However, I am grateful for the positive contributions that have been made, and it is good to see all Members on both sides of the House supporting the aims of the Bill.

Incapacity is no respecter of persons. It behoves us all to do everything in our power to improve the circumstances of those who sadly find themselves in that situation.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, at the sitting on Monday 26th July, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Message from the Lords shall have been received.—[Mr. Hill.]

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. David Cunliffe

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

2.40 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): I regret to have to raise an individual case on the Floor of the House, but, as I shall reveal, there are lessons to be learned from it.

David Alan Cunliffe, the son of one of my constituents, died of an overdose of amphetamine on Wednesday 2 October 1996 in his flat in Higher Openshaw, Manchester, aged 29. He had lived there for two years. His correct name was known to his landlord and it was on a bottle of tablets and a probation service report found in the flat by the police. He was taken to the mortuary at Manchester royal infirmary, where a pathological examination was conducted and the cause of death established.

When the police searched David's flat, they could find no evidence that would lead them into direct contact with relatives. However, the probation service report, which was dated 11 July 1995, said that he had been involved with drugs and crime for a long time and that he was from the Bolton area. Significantly, the report also referred to the fact that he had suffered from mental illness and had been treated as an in-patient at Prestwich hospital.

David had long been involved with the police, in Bolton and in Manchester, and I have provided my hon. Friend the Minister with evidence that he was very well known to them, especially in Bolton. About three years before his death, he was arrested in Bolton and held at Bolton central police station in the cells, where a balloon containing illegal substances burst in his mouth, causing an overdose that resulted in collapse and transfer to what was then Bolton district hospital. His mother, who has lived in the same house in my constituency for the past 22 years, was contacted within two hours by the police.

Following David's death in Manchester, a police officer at Collyhurst police station contacted the Greater Manchester police press office on 10 October 1996 with a request to include the fatality on its press media line. Following that, the police received no inquiries. The police officer made no attempt to contact either the Bolton Evening News or the Manchester Evening News to establish whether they had carried the story. We have established that they did not.

As a result of complaints received from David's sister—Mrs. Rita Houghton, who is also one of my constituents—Greater Manchester police have changed their procedures. Officers are now asked to follow up press media line notices if they receive no inquiries and they specifically ask local newspapers to carry news of fatalities if they have not already done so in order that every effort is made to contact relatives. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister agrees that every police force should be rigorous in that respect and I hope that she will issue instructions following this sad episode.

David Cunliffe was buried at the expense of Manchester social services department on 4 December 1996 in a common grave in Gorton cemetery, where his body still lies in section L116. His relatives want the body to be exhumed and transferred to Bolton so that they can attend a proper funeral. The problem is that they cannot afford to exhume the body and transfer it to Bolton. Even worse, a second body has been buried in the common grave on top of that of David. We obtained the permission of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to exhume both bodies and permission was obtained from the relatives of the second person to disturb the grave. Unfortunately, our exhumation certificate expired on 7 May, although we can have it renewed.

I suggested to Greater Manchester police that they had made little attempt to locate David's relatives and that they should meet the cost of exhumation and reburial as a matter of good will, but they declined. It appears that they contacted local hospitals, but I am not sure which ones. They may have contacted Bolton district hospital, given the Bolton connection. They allege, however, that the hospital, or hospitals, would not reveal the addresses of David's relatives, on grounds of confidentiality, which apparently is preserved even following death.

I took the matter up with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health, who confirmed that "it would be in order for access to medical records to be refused where there was no consent from the next of kin".

In the same letter, however—dated 30 March this year—my right hon. Friend said:

"The Trust"—

Central Manchester Healthcare NHS trust—

"have confirmed that, where a patient dies in hospital and has no known next of kin, then the notes would be read and any names and addresses passed to the police to help them trace the next of kin".

Unfortunately, David did not die in Manchester royal infirmary.

The Greater Manchester police also claim to have contacted Bolton metropolitan borough council's housing department, the probation services and social services to make inquiries about relatives—surprisingly, without success. However, on or about 5 June 1997, an informal inquiry at Prestwich hospital revealed the address of David's mother, who was then informed by the police of his death, which had taken place nine months earlier. I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that Prestwich hospital was mentioned in the probation service report of 1995, which was found in David's flat on the day of his death.

At a recent meeting attended by the deputy chief constable of Greater Manchester police, I asked whether, if David Cunliffe had been found murdered rather than overdosed, the police would have been able to gain access to the addresses of relatives. After a pause, the police admitted that they had the ways and means so to do. Does my hon. Friend agree that hospitals need to be given clear guidelines if they are to help the police in all fatality cases, not merely murder cases?

Why does my hon. Friend think that Greater Manchester police appear not to have made inquiries of K division in Bolton, where David Cunliffe's criminal activities were well known? They have made the excuse that he used aliases, but I remind the House that the probation service report and the bottle of tablets found in David's flat were in his correct name. The landlord had also been given his correct name. There seems to have been a lack of care on the part of the police, but I cannot get them to accept that.

I remind my hon. Friend also that the police have changed their procedures following complaints from the family. I cannot believe that Greater Manchester police, with all their training and resources, could not have found David Cunliffe's relatives and saved his family all that anguish if they had tried just that little bit harder.

At the meeting that I held with Great Manchester police, they claimed that the Data Protection Acts had made their inquiries more difficult in cases such as this, because they are not allowed to keep what they describe as "dangerous information" in computer files, however useful it might be to their present work or their future activities. It was suggested that a lot of useful information had been weeded out since the setting up of computer databases throughout the police force.

I have also corresponded with Councillor Stephen Murphy, the chairman of the Greater Manchester police authority, and Councillor Frank White, a former Member of Parliament who is now Bolton metropolitan borough's representative on the police committee. Both have been extremely helpful. They feel, as I do, that David's family have suffered unnecessarily and should be given as much help as possible at this stage for compassionate reasons.

Let me now turn to the role of the coroner for the Manchester city district, who dealt with the case. By the time of the inquest, relatives had been contacted. In a letter to me dated 19 May this year, the coroner admitted that he knew that a brother had been in court. In fact, David's brother and two sisters were in court on that day. The coroner also knew that Manchester's social services department had been involved with the burial, but he did not establish the reasons for that.

Manchester contains numerous people with no fixed abode, whose families are not local and who have very few belongings, which, when searched, give no information about relatives. In some cases, even when relatives can be contacted, some cannot, or will not bury their relatives' bodies. The cost then falls on the Manchester social services department.

Following my approach to the coroner about David Cunliffe's death, he has informed his staff that, when told that social services are involved in a case, they should ask the reasons why. If the answer is because relatives cannot be found, in future further questions will be asked. The fatality has caused the coroner to change his procedures, too.

The coroner has informed me that, at the time of David's death, there was a designated coroners officer who, if he had been approached in such a case, would have made appropriate investigations to trace relatives, or to ensure that the police made every effort to do so before releasing the body for burial. However, in the David Cunliffe case, the coroner does not know exactly what was done.

It is an extremely sad story. I am sure that many people like David Cunliffe die in similarly tragic circumstances without their relatives knowing. Somewhere, there are two of David Cunliffe's children from a former relationship. Surely, they have a right to know what happened to their father and where he is buried. His mother, brothers and sisters certainly have a right to know. Can it be that the lives of people who become the victims of the misuse of drugs are not regarded as quite as important as yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or mine? I hope that that is not the case.

The systems have failed the Cunliffe family. If only the police had been a bit more diligent; if only they had established better communications with the coroner's office; if only the coroner had asked the police some relevant questions; if only the references to Bolton and Prestwich hospital in the probation report that was found in David's flat had been followed up immediately; if only the national health service had been given clear guidelines about helping the police with inquiries arising from all fatalities, not just murders, David Alan Cunliffe might have been reunited with his family for a proper burial. Is it too late?

I do not attempt to apportion blame in what is a sad case. I raise the issue in the hope, first, that someone will help the Cunliffe family, even at this late stage, and, secondly, that the Minister will try to ensure that authorities throughout the country will learn something from the case.

2.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) for clearly setting out the background to this tragic case and the lessons that he considers should be drawn from it. I welcome the consistent work that he has put into the case and his dealings with all the authorities—I would expect no less from him as a Member of Parliament.

No hon. Member can really understand the pain and distress that David Cunliffe's family felt on learning of David's death eight months after it occurred and of his burial in an unmarked grave. I share the concern that the relevant authorities should learn from the case, even though, as my hon. Friend has said, it is not necessarily possible to apportion blame for what occurred.

It is a painful but necessary task, which the police perform, to trace and notify the next of kin of the death of their loved ones. We might expect that to be a straightforward task in a modern age of instant communication and computer databases, but that underestimates the difficulties that can occur in some cases, particularly with those who have perhaps distanced themselves from family, who lived on what can be seen as the fringes of society.

As my hon. Friend has said, David Cunliffe was found dead at his home in Openshaw, where he lived alone, on 2 October 1996. As in all suspicious deaths, the Greater Manchester police conducted initial inquiries into the circumstances of his death, and reported the case to the coroner. The cause of death was established as a drugs overdose.

Greater Manchester police say that they were unable to identify Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin and extensive inquiries were, therefore, conducted to trace them. To clarify a point that was raised by my hon. Friend, those inquiries were carried out by the officer designated locally to liaise with the coroner's office on such cases.

The police say that the local health bodies were contacted for assistance, but that, in accordance with their confidentiality policy, they were unable to provide the information requested to the police. Social services and the probation service were also contacted, but they were unable to provide any information that would assist in locating the next of kin.

An appeal for relatives of the deceased to come forward was included on the Greater Manchester police media line, which is an information line accessed by the local media. Unfortunately, there is no obligation on the press to carry such appeals and, as my hon Friend noted, this particular appeal was not picked up by either the Bolton Evening News or the Manchester Evening News although it might have helped to lead police to Mr. Cunliffe's family.

The unsuccessful outcome of those inquiries was reported to the coroner, who authorised the release of Mr. Cunliffe's body for burial. This was carried out on 4 December 1996, just after two months after he had been found dead. As my hon. Friend has said, he was buried in a common grave in Gorton cemetery. The cost of burial was met by Manchester social services in the absence of the next of kin.

However, it was not the end of the matter for the police. A second officer continued to make inquiries to trace David Cunliffe's next of kin. In June 1997, I understand that informal contact between the officer and a local hospital led the police to identify the address of David's mother and the police were finally able to break the news to her of her son's death the previous October. It should be noted that there had not been any inquiries to the police regarding Mr. Cunliffe's whereabouts in the intervening period.

It is clearly regrettable that it took so long to trace Mr. Cunliffe's family, but that does not necessarily mean that the police were somehow at fault in the way they carried out this task. Nor would I accept that the circumstances of Mr. Cunliffe's death meant that the police were not as rigorous as they should have been in this case. I remind my hon. Friend that police inquiries continued until Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin had been traced and informed of his death.

The actions and decisions taken by police officers in the course of their duties are an operational matter for the chief officer of the police force concerned. Following representations from the family, I understand that Greater Manchester police carried out an internal review of the case. It confirmed that the officers involved had followed normal police procedures in the attempt to trace Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin. As I have said, inquiries had been made of relevant local authorities and agencies, but without success. As part of their review, the police approached these authorities and agencies again to ask for the same details of next of kin. The review team received the same response as the original officers and concluded that there was no reason to criticise the officers involved in the initial investigation.

The review, however, did identify a lack of knowledge about the operation of the force's media line, which had been used in the unsuccessful attempt to place an appeal for information in the local press. Recommendations were made to improve awareness of the way the line operated and, as my hon. Friend indicated, police officers are now meant to follow up appeals on the media line if no response is received and, if necessary, specifically ask the local press to cover particular appeals.

The police were unable to obtain details of Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin when they initially approached local hospitals because of the confidentiality policy operated there. Decisions on disclosure are a matter for the NHS trust or other body which is being asked to disclose, so it would not be appropriate for me to comment on the decision taken by those bodies. However, as my hon. Friend said, there are discussions on that.

In March 1996 the Department of Health issued guidance to the national health service on the protection and use of patient information. The guidance explains that personal information is protected by common law, the Data Protection Acts and the ethical responsibilities of health professionals. In general, any information given or received in confidence for one purpose may not be used for another or passed to anyone else without the consent of the provider of the information. That is unlikely to have been a problem as, on an earlier occasion, as my hon. Friend indicated, Mr. Cunliffe was admitted to hospital after a balloon containing drugs burst in his mouth and the police were able to contact his mother within two hours.

The duty of confidence continues to apply even after a patient's death. The Department of Health guidance makes it clear, however, that the duty is not absolute and it may give way to an overriding public interest. Further, although the guidance recognises that the duty of confidence may continue after death, disclosure in the public interest should be easier to justify in such circumstances. However, the responsibility for deciding whether to allow disclosure rests with the NHS body concerned, based on the circumstances of the request.

As my hon. Friend said, the Department of Health is aware of the need to raise awareness of protocols for information sharing between NHS and non-NHS bodies, and of the need to ensure that confidentiality requirements do not become a bar to the legitimate flow of information. All NHS organisations were asked to have in place, by April 1999, "guardians" of patient confidentiality to help improve the way in which the NHS handles confidential patient information. One of the guardians' responsibilities will be to oversee the development of information-sharing protocols and ensure effective liaison with non-NHS partner organisations. Each organisation's performance will be monitored by the Department of Health, and I hope that that will lead to more effective co-operation with the police service.

My hon. Friend has also mentioned the role of the coroner in this sad case. As he will know, it is not a function of the coroner to identify the relatives of those whose deaths are reported to him for investigation. However, as part of a coroner's inquiries, it will usually be necessary to make contact with the immediate family in case they are able to shed any light on the circumstances of the death, and so that they may, if they wish, exercise their rights in relation to any post mortem examination or at the inquest.

It is also a matter for the coroner to decide when and to whom he should release the body for burial or cremation. The normal practice is to release the body at the earliest opportunity, and in advance of the substantive inquest hearing. The body will normally be released to the executors or family of the deceased.

In the great majority of cases, relatives can be located readily, but occasionally there can be difficulties, and in some cases there will be no relatives to find. It will be a matter for the coroner's judgment to decide how much effort should be devoted to such inquiries in the light of all the circumstances known to him. When there appears to be no one else to make the funeral arrangements, the coroner may release the body to the local authority. That is what happened in David Cunliffe's case.

[Kate Hoey]

The Home Office has not issued guidance to coroners on how to proceed in those circumstances. I note, however, that the Manchester city coroner has decided that, in future, if his staff are told that the local authority is making the funeral arrangements, action should be taken to determine whether further inquiries could be made to establish the whereabouts of any relatives. I am not sure how much more effective that may be than police inquiries, but it clearly makes sense to make every reasonable effort to find the family of the deceased. We therefore propose to consider the matter with coroners generally, to determine whether there are some helpful lessons to be learned.

All hon. Members will have sympathy with the family's concern to have David's body exhumed for a family burial in Bolton. As my hon. Friend mentioned, when the problem of the location of David Cunliffe's grave was brought to my Department's attention, we explained that a Home Office licence under section 25 of the Burial Act 1857 would be needed to remove the body for reburial elsewhere, but also that, as there was another body in the grave, the agreement of that person's next of kin would be required. With the assistance of the burial authorities at Gorton cemetery, the next of kin of the other deceased person was traced and consent was duly given. On 7 May 1998, Home Office licences were issued.

Although, as my hon. Friend pointed out, the validity of those licences has now expired, I assure him that there should be no difficulty in principle in reissuing the licences for a further period, provided that there has been no material change in circumstances. However, I should say that, out of consideration for the other family involved, it might be best not to renew the application until there is some certainty that the exhumations can proceed.

My hon. Friend has suggested that Greater Manchester police should meet the costs of exhumation and reburial, presumably because of their failure to trace Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin at the time of his death. Although the force is sympathetic to the family's predicament, for the reasons I have explained, the force cannot accept that it was responsible for the delay that occurred, and therefore cannot agree to cover the costs involved in Mr. Cunliffe's exhumation and reburial. That is the decision of the chief constable, and there is no discretion for me to intervene in the matter.

The House will recognise that there are circumstances in which it is appropriate for public funds to be used to provide a proper burial. That was clearly the case when, in the absence of the next of kin, the costs of the original burial were met by Manchester social services. It may be appropriate for the family to approach the social services department again, if there is a difficulty in finding the cost of reburial.

I understand how strongly my hon. Friend feels on this matter and I thank him for raising the case in the House today. We all have immense sympathy for Mr. Cunliffe's family and are concerned that it was not possible for the police to contact his parents earlier with the sad news of their son's death.

I hope that I have shown that the police do take seriously their responsibilities in this regard and that considerable efforts were made to trace Mr. Cunliffe's next of kin, eventually with success. For that reason, the chief constable is not prepared to meet the costs of exhumation and reburial, although my Department will look favourably on any application from the family to renew the licences.

My hon. Friend has made a number of important points about the police service, the coroners and other agencies, and how they could improve their procedures for dealing with such cases. I am pleased that, as he said, certain improvements have already been made. We can always look for new ways of ensuring that the co-operation between agencies makes a real difference in particular circumstances. I encourage the police, in particular, to continue to look for ways in which to apply the lessons learned from this and similar cases to improve the service that they provide.

I hope that my hon. Friend will find some comfort from what has been said in this short debate, and that Mr. Cunliffe's family will realise that his case has been discussed at the most senior levels of Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Three o'clock.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

War Crimes Prosecution

Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the consideration by the CPS of the case for the prosecution of an individual whose name has been sent to him under the War Crimes Act 1991. [90450]

The Attorney-General: I am aware that the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) is currently considering an allegation against an individual under the War Crimes Act 1991. The CPS is at an advanced stage in its consideration of the case.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Attorney-General what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90147]

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scale specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Stroke Units

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the age criteria for admission to specialised stroke units in each Southern Health and Social Services Board general hospital which has such a unit. [89949]

Mr. McFall: Adult patients from all age groups are admitted to Craigavon Area Hospital's stroke unit, which is located in Lurgan Hospital.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which general hospitals sited within the boundaries of the Southern Health and Social Services Board (a) have specialised stroke units and (b) do not have specialised stroke units; which of the latter have plans to establish such units; and what are the target dates. [89947]

Mr. McFall: Craigavon Area Hospital has a specialised stroke unit which is located at Lurgan Hospital.

South Tyrone and Daisy Hill Hospitals do not have specialised stroke units. Following a review of hospital services for the elderly which is due to be completed in September 1999, it is anticipated that discussions will take place with South Tyrone and Daisy Hill about the establishment of additional specialised stroke services.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to which units stroke clients (a) under 65 years of age and (b) 65 years of age and over, living within the boundaries of the Southern Health and Social Services Board, are sent if there is no stroke unit available at a Southern Health and Social Services Board general hospital. [89950]

Mr. McFall: Within the Southern Health and Social Services Board area, patients with a diagnosis of stroke are admitted to the specialty of general medicine at Craigavon Area Hospital, South Tyrone Hospital or Daisy Hill Hospital for full assessment, appropriate investigation and stabilisation of their condition. Rehabilitation is arranged when clinically indicated. This is usually undertaken by a geriatrician where a patient is over 65.

There is a dedicated stroke unit at Lurgan Hospital, which is part of the Craigavon Area Hospital Trust. Patients are transferred to the Unit, as appropriate, for a further period of rehabilitation. The stroke unit accepts adult patients from all age groups.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the existing and planned specialised stroke units in Southern Health and Social Services Board general hospitals which are established to treat stroke clients in (a) the acute phase, (b) the rehabilitation phase and (c) both phases. [89948]

Mr. McFall: There is one specialised stroke unit in the Southern Area at present. This is located in Lurgan hospital, which is part of the Craigavon Area Hospital Trust.

The Southern Board is currently undertaking a review of hospital services for the elderly which is due to be completed in September. It is anticipated that this review will recommend that all acute hospitals in the Southern Board area should have dedicated stroke services to treat both the acute and rehabilitation phases.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by her within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90159]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoner Releases

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) republican, (b) loyalist and (c) other prisoners have been released during each month under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement; how many are projected to be released up to September 2000; and how many eligible prisoners will remain in detention after that date. [89914]

Mr. Ingram: Table A lists the number of republican, loyalist and other prisoners who have been released during each month under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

Table A

	Republican	Loyalist	Others	Total
September 1998	28	33	1	62
October 1998	71	54	4	129
November 1998	12	8	2	22
December 1998	7	8	1	16
January 1999	2	6	0	8
February 1999	3	2	0	5
March 1999	7	4	0	11
April 1999	2	7	0	9
May 1999	2	3	1	6
June 1999	9	0	0	9
Total	—	—	—	277

Table B shows that a total of 60 prisoners have been deemed to meet the requirements of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 by the Sentence Review Commission and have been given Substantive Determinations with release dates up to end September 2000:

Table B

	Number
Republican	29
Loyalist	30

The 1998 Act also provides that, if circumstances permit, prisoners with release dates falling after the second anniversary of the enactment of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act, who have served two years or more of their sentence, will be released on that anniversary. Table B does not include those prisoners with release dates beyond 30 September 2000.

As stated, the Act provides that a prisoner who has been granted a declaration shall not be permitted release before he has served two years of the sentence to which the declaration relates. A total of 4 prisoners who have been granted Substantive Determinations fall into this category. They will be required to remain in prison to serve two years of the sentence to which the declaration relates and in each case this will extend beyond September 2000.

The information provided for this written question is current at 1 July 1999.

Prison Officers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what disciplinary sanctions have been imposed on prison officers following complaints of ill-treatment in each of the last five years. [89915]

Mr. Ingram: There has been no cases of disciplinary sanctions being taken against prison officers in Northern Ireland following complaints made by prisoners over the last five years.

Prisoners (Proscribed Organisations)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current prison population of members or associates of each specified and non-specified proscribed organisation. [89916]

Mr. Ingram: Information is held for management purposes in relation to the perceived paramilitary association of prisoners where applicable. It should be noted, however, that with the exception of HMP Maze where such links are more clearly defined, this information is based on a combination of factors including the offence, sympathies and associates. These figures do not include prisoners who are regarded as only having either Loyalist or Republican sympathies.

The most recent statistics for week commencing 5 July 1999 are as follows:

Specified	UDA	UVF	LVF	UFF	RHC	PIRA	INLA
HMP Maze	33	31	15	6	—	70	17
HMP Maghaberry	30	25	6	6	4	14	16
HMP Magilligan	14	7	—	1	—	6	4
YOC Hydebank	1	3	—	1	—	2	1
Total	78	66	21	14	4	92	38

Non-specified	CIRA
HMP Maze	—
HMP Maghaberry	4
HMP Magilligan	—

Chief Constable (Meetings)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list and state the duration of visits made and meetings attended by the RUC Chief Constable involving (a) community or other groups perceived to be of Nationalist or Catholic affiliation, (b) community or other groups perceived to be of Unionist or Protestant affiliation and (c) cross-community groups in the last year. [89917]

Mr. Ingram: Records of visits and meetings are not maintained in a way that would allow provision of the analysis requested. However, the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary has always made himself available to respond to invitations to visit and attend meetings with groups of all perceived affiliations in the Province. He is not influenced by whether this perceived affiliation might be Nationalist, Catholic, Unionist, Protestant, Cross-community or other.

PRIME MINISTER

EC Development Assistance Programmes

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if it is Government policy to restrict spending increases allotted to EC development assistance programmes; and if he will make a statement. [89735]

The Prime Minister: The Government seek to spend the United Kingdom's international development budget on those programmes which are most effective in contributing to the achievement of the international poverty eradication targets.

During negotiations for the period 1993–99, the previous administration agreed to increase the amount of money allocated to the EC's development programmes by 180 per cent. This increase means that the UK now channels 30 per cent. of its international development budget through the EC. Owing to concerns about the effectiveness and impact of the EC's development assistance programmes, the UK successfully sought to hold down the level of growth to 1 per cent. for international development expenditure in the negotiations for 2000–06.

At the end of last year, the Department for International Development published a strategy paper setting out detailed proposals for strengthening its collaboration with the EC to improve the poverty focus and effectiveness of its programmes. Copies were placed in the Library.

Business Men (Courtesy Calls)

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Prime Minister how many business men have paid individual courtesy calls on him at No. 10 Downing Street since he took office; how many were citizens of the United States; and how many had no business activities within the United Kingdom. [90364]

The Prime Minister: I frequently meet many people in the course of my duties and this properly includes business men from here and abroad. It is the job of the British Prime Minister to promote this country as a place to invest, boosting British jobs and prosperity. I have done this on many occasions and will continue to do so.

European Community Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the Government department responsible for supplying the UK delegate to each European Community working group. [90436]

The Prime Minister: The UK's Permanent Representation is staffed by FCO officials and officials seconded to the FCO from various Whitehall Departments. UKREP staff report to the UK Permanent Representative and represent the Government as a whole. Seconded staff generally work in the Section which deals with the issues handled by their home department and attend the relevant working groups.

IRA Arms

Mr. Field: To ask the Prime Minister what is his estimate of the amount of arms possessed by the IRA. [90302]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 July 1999]: It is not possible to be specific in this matter. I can, however, say that substantial amounts of firearms, munitions and explosives are illegally held by various groups in Northern Ireland.

Foreign Media (Articles)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those articles he has written in his official capacity for foreign newspapers and journals since 3 February. [90847]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on 26 April 1999, Official Report, columns 11–12.

KLA Meeting

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the content of his discussions with KLA officials on 18 May; and if he will indicate who arranged the meeting. [90845]

The Prime Minister: The KLA briefed me on the situation on Kosovo and requested assistance for internally displaced people in Kosovo. I took the opportunity to call for unity among Kosovo Albanian groups. The meeting was arranged by the British Embassy in Tirana.

Ministerial Changes

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister on what recent occasions he has stated that he had not started to consider the next round of ministerial changes; and if he will place transcripts of the relevant statements in the Library. [90750]

The Prime Minister: I was asked about this in an interview with the BBC R4 Today programme about Northern Ireland. I am placing a transcript of the relevant part in the Library.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister when his official spokesman briefed lobby journalists about his colleagues' prospects in the next round of ministerial changes; and when he was authorised to do so. [90749]

The Prime Minister: He has not done so.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Prime Minister what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90166]

The Prime Minister: Information is not recorded in the form requested. The majority of such correspondence is acknowledged as quickly as possible by my Office, and Ministers in the relevant Government Department are asked to reply. However, my Office has undertaken a check of the letters to which I reply personally, and over the past two months I have replied to almost 60 per cent. of hon. Members within 20 days. I always endeavour to reply as quickly as possible to all my correspondence.

Government Annual Report

Mr. Chope: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how many copies of the Government's 1997–98 Annual report were published; and at what cost to public funds; [90959]

(2) if he will place in the Library a summary of the response and comments received on the Government's 1997–98 Annual report; [90960]

(3) how many responses he received to the invitation contained in the Government's 1997–98 Annual report for people to notify him of their priorities for the year ahead; [90961]

(4) what date he intends to publish the Government's Annual report 1998–99. [90969]

The Prime Minister: This year's Annual Report will be published towards the end of this month. A summary of the responses and comments received on last year's Report will be placed in the Library to coincide with this publication, together with the total number of such responses.

Last year, 20,000 copies of the report were produced. This number was determined by The Stationery Office in accordance with the normal procedures they undertake for establishing the required print run for Government documents. As was made public on the day of publication, the direct cost to public funds of preparing the Report for publication was £96,000.

No. 10 Downing Street (Charles Darwin Portrait)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will ensure that a portrait of Charles Darwin is displayed at No. 10 Downing Street. [90802]

The Prime Minister: The Government Art Collection (GAC) advise on the pictures to be hung in 10 Downing Street. The pictures are changed periodically as those loaned to the house are returned to the collection from which they have been drawn. I agree that Charles Darwin is a significant figure in British history and I will ask the Curator of the GAC to consider my hon. Friend's suggestion at an appropriate point.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what meetings he or his junior Ministers have had with (a) Friends of the Earth and (b) the National Farmers Union to discuss genetically modified crops; [88784]

(2) what plans (a) he and (b) his Ministerial colleagues have to meet representatives of Friends of the Earth; and when the next such meeting is due to take place. [89951]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Ministers in this Department are in regular contact with representatives of those with an interest in biotechnology—including environmental groups, consumer groups and biotechnology companies. It is not the normal practice of Governments to give details of specific meetings with private individuals or companies.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the recent report entitled, Organic Farming and Gene Transfer from Genetically Modified Crops; and if he will make a statement [89151]

Mr. Meale: The report looked at organic farming and the issue of 'contamination' of organic crops and products by genetically modified (GM) crops. The issues raised by the report are ones not of safety but of consumer choice. No GM crops would be released into the environment if there were any reasons to believe that it would be harmful to human health or the environment. The recently published SCIMAC (Supply Chain Initiative on Modified Agricultural Crops) guidelines set out proposed separation distances between genetically modified and organic crops and SCIMAC has indicted that it is willing to review these in the light of experience.

Pesticide Use

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what evaluation he has undertaken of the relative effectiveness of economic instruments and other measures designed to minimise pesticide use; [88844]

(2) if he will set out, for each pesticide or group of pesticides, the scientific basis which would underlie the introduction of additional financial or other measures designed to minimise their use; [88845]

(3) what compensation regime would apply to farmers and agricultural producers to reflect the adverse impact of a pesticide tax. [88846]

Mr. Meale: The Government have been considering the case for introducing a pesticide tax as part of its policy for minimising pesticide use. A research report, commissioned by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on the design and impact of a possible tax, was published on 24 March and views were invited on a number of issues raised in this report. The Government are currently considering the responses to the consultative exercise.

Parking Spaces (Double Yellow-lined Highway)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will issue guidance to councils on their obligations under section 143 of the Highway Code relating to designated parking spaces near a junction on double yellow-lined highway; and if he will make a statement. [88174]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 28 June 1999]: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to designated parking places near junctions. The Highway Code makes it clear in Rule 217 that motorists should not park within 10 metres (32 feet) of a junction, except in an authorised parking space. It is entirely a matter for the local authority concerned to decide in the circumstances of each case whether it is safe to designate a parking space within 10 metres of a junction.

Coal-fired Power Stations (Emissions)

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the level of (a) carbon dioxide, (b) sulphur dioxide, (c) nitrogen oxide and (d) fine particulate emissions from coal-fired power stations for the latest year for which statistics are available; what percentage of the total of such emissions from United Kingdom power stations this represents; and what steps he will be taking to reduce those emissions. [89128]

Mr. Meale: The emissions from United Kingdom coal-fired power stations, set in the context of total power station emissions and total emissions are given in the table. The figures are taken from the National Atmospheric Emissions Inventory.

1997 emission estimates

	Carbon dioxide as carbon	Nitrogen oxides	Sulphur dioxide	Fine particulate matter (PM10)
Power station coal combustion (in kilotonnes)	26, 667	300	956	22
Percentage of total power station emissions	67	81	93	98
Percentage of total UK	18	16	58	12

Proposals for reducing emissions from English and Welsh power stations of sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxides and fine particulate matter were contained in a consultative paper published by the Environment Agency in March 1999. The information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland. The European Commission has recently adopted a Proposal for a National Emission Ceilings Directive, which potentially implies further reductions in sulphur dioxide emissions beyond those already envisaged. The Government are considering their response to the Proposal.

Following the consultation on climate change, which ran from October 1998 to February 1999, we are now developing a draft UK climate change programme which we are aiming to publish later this year for further consultation. The draft programme will cover all sectors of the economy, including power generators.

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many meetings of the JCC he has attended. [89280]

Mr. Prescott: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Monday 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 362.

GM Food

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the environmental implications of genetically modified food. [87938]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 1 July 1999]: The purpose of the current EU and UK legislation is to prevent or minimise any damage to the environment which may arise from the escape or release of genetically modified organisms.

Each application for the release of genetically modified (GM) plants is supported by a risk assessment, which is evaluated by Government experts and independent scientists on the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE). If there were any reason to believe that a release would be harmful to human health or the environment then it would not be allowed. The environmental assessments are available on the public register together with reports of monitoring carried out during and after the trial.

All GM crops intended for general cultivation must be covered by a valid Part C (marketing) consent issued under Council Directive 90/220/EEC on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms. Under the Directive a consent will be issued only where the environmental risk assessment demonstrates that the marketing will not cause significant harm to human health or the environment.

The farmscale evaluations will allow the Government to study the effects on the environment of the larger scale growing of GM crops year by year. If trends are spotted about possible adverse effects, we will have a sound basis for following these observations up and taking precautionary action. The work will be reviewed each year and we will use this to decide how best to proceed with the managed development of GM crops in the UK. This approach ensures that large-scale plantings do not proceed until we have sufficient evidence that the particular GM crop does not harm the environment.

DETR carries out research on the environmental impact of GM crops. Two important recent reports are "Environmental Risks of Herbicide Tolerant Oilseed Rape" and "The Commercial use of Genetically Modified Crops in the United Kingdom: the Potential Wider Impact on Farmland Wildlife". Copies of both reports are in the Library.

Supermarket Land Sale (Leyton)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the land at Leyton Yard was sold by his Department to Asda with extant planning permission for a supermarket and related developments; and if he will make a statement. [89562]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The land was sold with outline planning permission for mixed food and non food retail development and leisure facilities subject to a number of conditions contained in a Section 106 Planning

Agreement and other arrangements with the London Borough of Waltham Forest to provide community benefits and highway improvements.

Void Council Properties

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of council-owned properties was declared as void by the housing departments in (a) the London Borough of Wandsworth, (b) the City of Westminster and (c) the London Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham for 1998; and if he will make a statement. [89469]

Mr. Raynsford: As reported by them on their respective Housing Investment Programme (HIP) Operational Information returns, 2.0 per cent. of council-owned properties were vacant in the London Borough of Wandsworth on 1 April 1998, 1.7 per cent. in the City of Westminster and 2.3 per cent. in Hammersmith and Fulham. There is likely to be some variation in the proportion of dwellings that are vacant in a local authority from one date to another during the year.

Rented Accommodation

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many affordable homes to rent were developed in (a) the London Borough of Wandsworth, (b) the City of Westminster and (c) the London Borough of Hammersmith and Fulham in 1998; and if he will make a statement. [89468]

Mr. Raynsford: There were 266 additional rented social lettings provided in Hammersmith and Fulham in 1998–99 by registered social landlords, with support from the Housing Corporation's Approved Development Programme (ADP) and Local Authority Social Housing Grant (LASHG), 83 in Wandsworth and 196 in Westminster.

These additional social lettings come from new build, the purchase and rehabilitation of existing property and from empty properties brought into use for temporary social housing. The Approved Development Programme and LASHG also supports the provision of homes for shared ownership and incentive schemes which assist social tenants to move into home ownership and vacate their letting for others in housing need.

According to information provided to the Department by local authorities, there was no local authority new build in these boroughs during 1998–99 (other than any provided through LASHG).

Birds

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many special protection areas designated under the European Council Directive 79/409/EEC on the conservation of wild birds are subject to wildfowling; and what proportion of the total area so designated this constitutes. [89392]

Mr. Meale: I regret the information sought is not available. JNCC and the country agencies do not routinely gather statistical information on wildfowling activities at a national level. Wildfowling activities allowed under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 take place on many coastal and other SPAs. These activities may be subject to certain management restrictions within those SPAs.

Driver Vehicle Licensing Agency

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the performance of the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in meeting its targets over the past 12 months for the issue of driving licences. [90062]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Secretary of State's key targets for DVLA in 1998–99 were announced on 29 April 1999, Official Report, columns 223–25, and published in DVLA's 1998–99 Business Plan. There were four targets relating to the issue of driving licences, all of which DVLA achieved.

Refrigerants

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many refrigeration units are operating in his Department's buildings. [89936]

Mr. Meale: The Department has 102 air conditioning units in buildings across its estate.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of the refrigerators inside his Department use HFCs as their refrigerant. [89935]

Mr. Meale: Decisions on the purchase of refrigerators are for the Department's local property centres and details are not recorded centrally. My Department's practice is not to purchase refrigerators which use hydrofluorocarbons where suitable substitutes exist. For example, the specification for refrigerators in our new London headquarters buildings resulted in the use of the alternative refrigerant R600a.

Bypasses

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when construction work is scheduled to commence on the Lamberhurst Bypass in Kent; [90078]

(2) when detailed plans for the landscaping and design of the Lamberhurst Bypass will be published; [90079]

(3) on which dates the last traffic surveys were carried out at the western end of the Pembury bypass on the A21 in Kent; and when the Government plan to carry out the next traffic survey at the western end of the Pembury bypass on the A21 in Kent. [90080]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to the hon. Gentleman.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Archie Norman, dated 12 July 1999:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson, has asked the Chief Executive, Lawrie Haynes, to answer your recent Parliamentary Questions about the A21 Lamberhurst Bypass and traffic surveys at the western end of the A21 Pembury Bypass. I am replying in Lawrie's absence from the office.

In December last year Lord Whitty announced that the design and build contract for Lamberhurst Bypass would be let in the financial year 2001/02. That is the earliest practicable date having regard to the available funding and allowing for the outstanding processes. Those processes include finalising the arrangements for consultancy advice to the Highways Agency on the scheme and acquiring the land needed.

Landscaping proposals for the Lamberhurst Bypass were included in the Environmental Statement published in 1992 and then examined at the public inquiry later that year. I am sending you separately appropriate material from that time. Detailed final design will be undertaken by the company who are awarded the contract to build the bypass, though they will be required to do this within the constraints of the Environmental Statement. Their detailed landscaping and design plans would be available for inspection at public exhibitions just before the start of works on site, and plans would be finalised in consultation with the affected landowners and other appropriate bodies. I will send you copies of these plans when available.

Turning to your request for traffic information at the western end of the Pembury Bypass, traffic data were collected only up to and including 1992 during the development of the A21 Tonbridge to Pembury dualling scheme. However, traffic surveys are to be included in a study of the operational performance of the roundabout at the western end of the Pembury Bypass which we hope to be carried out towards the end of this financial year. Following the results of the main roads review announced in 1998, this scheme is now to be considered by the Regional Planning Conference as part of the Access to Hastings multi-modal study.

Single Regeneration Budget

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what work is being done to identify and promote best practice in community consultation by statutory bodies when making bids for Single Regeneration Budget funds. [90305]

Mr. Meale: The Government believe it is crucial to ensure the active participation of local communities in the regeneration of their areas. The Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) Round 5 Bidding Guidance issued in September 1998 indicated the need for local communities to be involved in both the preparation and implementation of bids. SRB final bids have now been received and indications are that bidders have indeed involved local communities.

My Department runs a programme of information exchange and dissemination to support regeneration partnerships in the management and delivery of their schemes. In particular, my Department has published a guide for practitioners "Involving Communities in Urban and Rural Regeneration" which provides advice to those responsible for regeneration activity at the local level on how to set about involving the community. We also work with other organisations to encourage the identification and promotion of good practice, and will be learning from any relevant lessons the New Deal for Communities programme throws up.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans there are to twin or place senior civil servants with areas that qualify for Single Regeneration Budget funds. [90314]

Mr. Meale: The Government's Policy Action Team on Learning Lessons is considering the scope for more secondments of civil servants to work in local authority or voluntary sector projects in poor neighbourhoods, which could include projects involving SRB funds. The team is reporting this month and we will give serious consideration to any recommendations they may make.

Private Landlords

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to give local authorities additional powers to require private landlords to improve and renovate housing. [90274]

Mr. Raynsford: We intend to reform the housing fitness standard by introducing a risk-based rating system which will enable local authorities to target enforcement action against unfit privately rented housing more effectively. We also intend to introduce a national mandatory licensing system for houses in multiple occupation.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to give greater protection to sites of special scientific interest; and if he will make a statement. [90176]

Mr. Meale: Our proposals for giving greater protection to sites of special scientific interest were set out in the Government consultation paper "Sites of Special Scientific Interest—Better Protection and Management" issued in September 1998. We have recognised the need to give thorough consideration to the most effective measures we can introduce, and will be announcing our conclusions shortly.

Special Conservation Areas

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of special areas of conservation; and if he will make a statement. [90178]

Mr. Meale: The Government have recently announced that a completed list of 340 wildlife sites nominated for special protection (cSACs) under the Habitats Directive has been submitted to the European Commission. The next stage is for the national lists to be discussed at a meeting of member states in the Atlantic biogeographic region in September. It is too early to make a full scientific assessment of how far the identification of these sites has contributed to the conservation of the habitat types and species concerned but they are given the highest priority for conservation action by English Nature. I am confident that this is a further step forward, reaffirming our determination to protect our own natural heritage and our commitment to European and international conservation initiatives.

Planning Inspectors

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons the Planning Inspectorate's Guidance Notes for Candidates, in respect of the recruitment of planning inspectors (1999–2000) precludes candidates from membership of the Freemasons. [90246]

Mr. Raynsford: Because membership of a secret society such as the Freemasons may be incompatible with the requirement that Planning Inspectors should be fair, open and impartial.

Bus Lane, New London Road

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessments he has made of the impact which his Department's funding of a bus lane on the New London Road, Chelmsford will have on (a) motorists, (b) traffic on roads running off the New London Road and (c) the number of people using buses. [90145]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 July 1999]: My Department has funded a local transport package for Chelmsford which encourages improved public transport, in line with our policies for integrated transport. It is for Essex County Council as the local transport authority, to decide on the detailed implementation of that package and to monitor the results. As we made clear in "From Workhorse to Thoroughbred: A better role for bus travel", published in March, a well-conceived scheme for bus priority can produce a rapid pay-back in time savings and improved service reliability.

Portsmouth Millennium Tower

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the objectors to the Portsmouth Millennium Tower Transport and Works Act 1992 application; what discussions he has had with them; and on what grounds. [90418]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The outstanding objections to the Portsmouth Millennium Tower Transport and Works Act application are from Railtrack, the Portsmouth Society, the Gosport Society and three private individuals. Their objections concern the appropriateness of locating the [illegible]ed Tower in Portsmouth Harbour, the environmental [illegible]conomic impacts of the scheme, and the need to pr[illegible]ct the pier supporting Portsmouth Harbour railway station. No discussions have been held with the objectors.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons he has postponed making a decision on whether to hold a public inquiry into the Transport and Works Act application for Portsmouth Millennium Tower. [90966]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Secretary of State has deferred his decision on whether to hold a public inquiry into this application at the request of the applicants, Berkeley Festival Waterfront Company Ltd., who intend to submit some amendments to their scheme. An informed decision on the appropriate procedural route can best be taken after the details of the amendments are known and interested parties have had the opportunity to consider and comment on them. This would also help to avoid the risk of potentially abortive work being undertaken on the basis of the present proposals.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a decision on the Transport and Works Act application for the Portsmouth Millennium Tower before the planning application for the tower has been considered by the local planning authority; and if he will make a statement. [90965]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Where a Transport and Works Act (TWA) Order is applied for, the promoters may either ask the Secretary of State to grant deemed planning permission at the same time as making an Order, or they may (as in this case) apply separately to the local planning authority for planning permission. In the latter situation, the Secretary of State would not make a TWA Order unless the works the subject of that Order had received planning permission.

New Deal for Communities

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if local authority district areas designated for New Deal for Communities in the first round will be considered for subsequent schemes. [90390]

Mr. Meale: We are currently considering the targeting of future rounds of the New Deal for Communities. We intend to announce the outcome after the summer recess.

Biosafety Protocol

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what proposals were promoted by the Government at the EU Environment Council on 24 and 25 June in respect of the Biosafety Protocol; [90519]

(2) what steps the Government took at the EU Environment Council on 24 and 25 June to oppose attempts to exclude or exempt any genetically-engineered organisms from labelling requirements under the Biosafety Protocol; [90520]

(3) if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the resumption of the Biosafety Protocol negotiations, and on the position the Government advocated at the EU Environment Council on 24 and 25 June in respect of any such resumption. [90518]

Mr. Meacher: The Environment Council Meeting held on 24 and 25 June concluded that the Commission and the member states should make every effort to promote a successful completion to negotiations of the Biosafety Protocol with the aim of concluding negotiations by about the end of the year. The meeting agreed that, based on consultations held so far, there was no need to amend the elements which formed the compromise package tabled by the EU at the end of the Cartagena meeting, including proposals for documentation. The UK fully supported these conclusions.

Waterside Park Business Park

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if a notice of date, time and place of the public inquiry into Waterside Park business park was published in local newspapers; [90546]

(2) if all those people who (a) objected to the proposal for the Waterside Park business park directly and (b) had their objections forwarded to him by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), were notified of the inquiry and the pre-inquiry hearing. [90547]

Mr. Raynsford: Details of the public inquiry were not published in the local press. However, in the interest of natural justice the inquiry has been adjourned to allow all interested parties additional time to prepare and make their views known on this proposal. I will write to my hon. Friend when I have more details.

Seahorse-Exodus Incident

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the Marine Accident Investigation Branch report into the Seahorse-Exodus incident of March 1997 has not been published; and if he will make a statement. [90703]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This accident, which took place in Irish territorial waters, was investigated by both the Irish and UK governments working in full co-operation. The Irish authorities have completed their investigation and are preparing their report for publication. The UK's Marine Accident Investigation Branch conducted the investigation under their "Inspector's Investigation" procedure whereby the report is not formally published but is made available to involved and interested parties. The report was sent to the Irish authorities.

Local Government (Organisation and Standards) Bill

Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many replies were received in response to consultation on the draft Local Government (Organisation and Standards) Bill. [90973]

Ms Armstrong: Two hundred and eighty one written responses have been received to consultation on the draft Local Government (Organisation and Standards) Bill, published in the Paper "Local leadership, local choice". Of these, only one has asked to remain confidential. A list of the rest has today been placed in the Library of the House and full copies of these have been made available in my Department's library for public scrutiny. Copies of the responses have also been passed to the Joint Committee which is currently examining the draft Bill.

In addition, 2,351 pre-printed postcards were received as part of a campaign by Charter 88 calling for the use of proportional representation in local government elections. One of these has also been placed in my Department's library.

Trains (Bicycle Spaces)

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will discuss with the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising and South West Trains, how many bicycle spaces were available on each five car Wessex Electric train operated by South West Trains in (a) January 1998 and (b) May 1999; and if he will establish the reasons for the change in provision. [90841]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In January 1998 bicycles were carried in the Guard's Van on South West Trains' Wessex Electric five car units. The number of bicycles which could be accommodated was dependant on the other demands for this space. A rebuild of the stock which was completed in May 1999 resulted in the former Guard's Van being replaced by 16 extra seats and a new area created for luggage. This included a dedicated bicycle rack designed to hold five machines. The reason for this decision was that commuters on SWT continue to experience overcrowding on their commuting journeys to London—in 1998 there was a 9.8 per cent. increase in the number of passengers. The Franchising Director's latest figures for Passengers in Excess of Capacity (PIXC), issued on 29 March, show that SWT's PIXC count was 3.9 per cent. against a target figure for the combined peaks of 3 per cent. Consequently SWT were required to agree a remedial plan with OPRAF. The provision of the 16 extra seats and consequently change in the arrangements for the carriage of bicycles was agreed by OPRAF as one of the remedial measures.

Road Traffic Reduction

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the principal councils which have submitted a report to him under the Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997; if he will list (a) the reductions in the levels of local road traffic and (b) the reduction in the rate of growth in the levels of such traffic contained in these reports; and what assessment of the road traffic reduction potential described in these reports he has made. [90952]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Statutory reports under the provisions of the Road Traffic Reduction Act 1997 are to be submitted—other than those produced by London Boroughs—in July 2000, as part of the first round of full local transport plans (LTPs). In London, the statutory reports will be linked with the submission of local implementation plans by the Boroughs, taking account of the Mayor's transport strategy. Authorities should also be submitting non-statutory 'interim' road traffic reduction reports at the end of July 1999, as part of their provisional LTPs—or as part of interim transport plans (ITPs) in the case of London Boroughs.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90165]

Mr. Meale: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend, the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

South West Regional Development Agency

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library a list of the regional stakeholders who were invited to nominate members for the South West Regional Development Agency. [90956]

Mr. Meale: The appointments to the Boards of the RDAs were announced by the Deputy Prime Minister on 14 December 1998. A table which lists the regional stakeholders who were invited to nominate members for the Board of the South West Regional Development Agency has been placed in the Library of the House.

My Department has recently initiated a fresh round of recruitment for appointments to the Boards. A table which lists the regional stakeholders in the South West who have been invited to offer nominations has also been placed in the Library of the House.

Candidates for the Boards of the RDAs have been sought from as wide a field as possible. In addition to seeking nominations from stakeholders we have advertised in the national, regional and ethnic press.

HFC Emissions

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate what percentage of emissions of HFC used as refrigerant gases come from systems used in (a) manufacturing industry, (b) commercial offices, (c) public sector offices and (d)(i) retail and (ii) domestic premises. [90958]

Mr. Meale: Data are not available for exactly these sectors, but the latest published data from 1995 show that in the UK the percentage of emissions of HFC gas in use as a refrigerant were as follows:

(a) 2.4 per cent. from manufacturing/industrial refrigeration

(d)(i) 73 per cent. from supermarket refrigeration

(d)(ii) 1.2 per cent. from domestic refrigeration.

Of the remaining emissions 6 per cent. are from small commercial sources, 1.2 per cent. are from cold water chillers (which may be found in any sector), 16 per cent. are from vehicle air conditioning and 1.2 per cent. are from refrigerated lorries.

Waste Incineration

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research he has commissioned or evaluated on the chemical content of bottom ash from incinerators; if its use as road-making material complies with his Department's specifications; and if he will make a statement. [90356]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Research carried out in 1993 for the Department of Transport looked into the chemical content of bottom ash from the incineration of municipal waste and its possible use in road construction. This concluded that due to the high concentration of soluble metals (eg. lead, zinc and arsenic) and sulphates, incinerator wastes are not suitable for use in road works in their unbound state. In certain circumstances it was suitable when combined with cement.

The specification used by the Highways Agency currently permits incinerator bottom ash to be used for road maintenance and construction in cement bound, lower strength road materials. High strength concrete made with incinerated municipal waste, even when sintered with clay, has not proved to be of suitable quality for use in road pavements.

Research is continuing to extend the use of incinerator bottom ash in construction.

Mobile Phones (Car Drivers)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce legislation to ban the use of hand-held mobile phones by drivers of a vehicle which is in transit. [89234]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My noble Friend Lord Carter stated the Government's position in the Second Reading debate on Lord Davies of Oldham Private Peer's Bill to make it an offence to drive while using a hand-held mobile phone. We are not persuaded at the moment that specific legislation is desirable.

Existing road traffic legislation places the responsibility on drivers to have proper control of their vehicles at all times. Any motorist who fails to do so, for whatever reason, is liable to prosecution. Drivers may be charged with failing to exercise proper control of a vehicle, or either careless and inconsiderate driving or dangerous driving, if using a mobile phone causes them to drive in such a manner. The Association of Chief Police Officers considers that this existing legislation is sufficient for the police to deal with cases arising from the use of a mobile phone while driving.

We believe that we are best placed to concentrate our efforts on publicising the dangers of using a mobile phone while driving. A publicity campaign was mounted last year. If persuasion is unsuccessful, we would be prepared to consider legislation at some time in the future.

Conflict Resolution Techniques

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the techniques used to resolve conflict within his Department and the circumstances in which each is used. [90548]

Mr. Meale: The Department's Complaints and Grievances Procedures provide for the resolution of disputes through informal local discussion between the parties or through formal independent investigation. Disputes over appraisal assessments are settled through local discussions or a review by a senior officer. The industrial relations practices and procedures in the Department are designed to enable management and the Trades Unions to endeavour to resolve difficulties through consultation and negotiation.

Objective 1 Programme (South Yorkshire)

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions by what means the director of the dedicated executive that will manage the Objective 1 programme in South Yorkshire will be recruited. [90625]

Mr. Meale: The management arrangements for the Objective 1 programme in South Yorkshire are currently being discussed between the South Yorkshire partners and the Government Office for Yorkshire and the Humber. These discussions include the role and appointment of the director.

Road Accidents

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) pedestrians and (b) cyclists were (i) killed, (ii) seriously injured and (iii) slightly injured in road accidents in the last year for which figures are available; and how many were under the age of 18 years in each category. [90854]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The numbers of pedestrians and cyclists recorded as being killed, seriously injured and slightly injured in road accidents, and the numbers of those who were aged under 18 years, are shown in the table.

Road accident casualties by road user type, severity and age: GB 1998

Number of casualties

Severity of casualty	Casualty type Pedestrian	Cyclist
All ages
Fatal	906	158
Serious	9,575	3,154
Slight	34,405	19,611
Total	44,886	22,923
Under 18
Fatal	120	35
Serious	3,988	1,072
Slight	15,729	7,247
Total	19,837	8,354

Local Government Finance

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the factors and indices used to determine the provision of area cost adjustment additions to standard spending assessments for local authorities. [90775]

Mr. Meale: The factors for the area cost adjustment are described in Annex D to the Local Government Finance Report (England) 1999–2000 (HC 143). The numeric values of the factors for each authority are set out in Annex H to that report.

Pesticide Tax

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish details of the models, proposed in the ECOTEC Research and Consulting Ltd. study commissioned by his Department on a pesticide tax, to examine the economic effects of a pesticide tax on (a) farm incomes and (b) farmers' behaviour. [90955]

Mr. Meale: The details of the models are set out in the Ecotec report which was published on 24 March.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Television Licences

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee how many television sets there are in the Parliamentary Estate; and how many licences are held. [90639]

Mrs. Roe: There are approximately 1,600 television sets within the Parliamentary Estate; buildings used and occupied by Parliamentary or Government employees do not require a television licence for sets used for official purposes. Television sets used for leisure or recreational purposes need to be separately licensed and a multiple licence is held for this throughout the Parliamentary Estate.

Parliamentary Time

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the President of the Council how much time has been devoted to debate on the floor of the House, excluding questions and statements, on the subjects of (a) education, (b) health and (c) age of consent, in the present session to date. [90784]

Mrs. Beckett: Although it is clearly difficult to decide in some cases whether a debate falls under a particular heading, I am advised that the figures are:

Health: 55 hours and 28 minutes

Education: 17 hours and 1 minute.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the President of the Council what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by her within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90158]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the European Communities working groups which met over the last 12 months with a representative from his Department in attendance; if he will list the number of times each met; if he will indicate the nature of the Government's representation; and if he will make a statement. [88471]

Mr. Michael: In common with some other Government departments the Welsh Office has signed a protocol with the EC under which UK Internal Audit units and the EC's Financial Control directorate co-ordinate audit work on EC structural funds. There is one annual plenary meeting with the EC's Financial Control directorate attended by the Head of Internal Audit of each relevant department, a representative of HM Treasury and a representative of the European Court of Auditors. The Welsh Office's Head of Internal Audit attended the meeting of March, 1999.

Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified in his question could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Jordan

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the current level in pounds sterling of United Kingdom bilateral aid to Jordan. [R] [90337]

Clare Short: Last year our programme to Jordan was about £3.5 million. This year we plan to spend up to £4 million.

UN Relief and Works Agency

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to increase funding to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency. [90343]

Mr. Foulkes: In 1998 we increased our contribution to United Nations Relief and Works Agency's (UNRWA) core budget by £1 million to £7 million, and in addition provided project funding and technical assistance of about £1 million. This year we plan similar levels of expenditure. We would be prepared to consider giving more if UNRWA implements measures to increase its efficiency and transparency.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by her within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90160]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Ministerial Meeting

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what was the purpose and location of the meeting between the Minister for the Arts and Mr. Ed McBride, of the US President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities on 25 February. [90426]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Mr. Ed McBride was a guest at a lunch organised and hosted by the British Council in Washington DC which I attended in order to develop an understanding of arts policy in the United States. I was particularly interested to learn about the President's Committee on the Arts and the Humanities' Coming up Taller awards, which seek to focus attention on how the arts can make a difference in the lives of children from disadvantaged backgrounds. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are committed to promoting access and educational opportunities in the arts precisely because we believe that the arts can make a difference in peoples' lives and can assist in the fight against social exclusion in this country.

National Collections Centre

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funds have been provided for the National Collections Centre from (a) the Government, (b) the National Lottery and (c) private sources since its inception. [90616]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government have allocated £1.4 million over the next two years to the National Museum of Science and Industry, for purchase of the site for the National Collections Centre and its refurbishment.

A bid to the Heritage Lottery Fund is being considered. No private funding is currently involved.

National Foundation for Youth Music

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the number of children who will benefit directly from the National Foundation for Youth Music. [90612]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The National Foundation for Youth Music is an independent body, and is responsible for identifying its outreach without reference to Ministers. The Foundation's ultimate aim is to ensure that all children have the opportunity to access music-making, particularly those who for geographical or other reasons are currently denied such access.

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the total amount of money raised in lieu of tobacco sponsorship to date by the Tobacco Sport Sponsorship Task Force. [90615]

Mr. Chris Smith: All sports will be given up to July 2003 to secure alternative sponsorship and those meeting the criteria for global sports will be allowed up to July 2006. My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport has maintained close contact with the seven sports seeking assistance from the Tobacco Task Force. All these sports have existing contracts running at least up to 2001 and until 2003 in most cases.

It is too soon to be looking to replace existing contracts and our help can most effectively be targeted in the 12 to 18 months before these lapse, which is the normal lead time for negotiating new sponsorships. In the meantime, the Task Force will be advising the sports on how they can reposition themselves in the market place and supporting them in building new commercial relationships which can be sustained. My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport has also recently had a very positive meeting with Richard Branson about possible help he can offer.

Departmental Website

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many hits his Department's website has received since 1 January. [90606]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport's website has received over 1.3 million hits since 1 January 1999.

"Our Healthier Nation"

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what (a) discussions and (b) meetings (i) he and (ii) the Minister for Sport had with the Secretary of State for Health regarding the White Paper, "Our Healthier Nation". [90614]

Mr. Chris Smith: Officials from both Departments met in advance of the publication of the Health White Paper to ensure full integration between "Our Healthier Nation" and my Department's forthcoming sports strategy. My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport will be meeting my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health later this month to discuss opportunities for further collaborative work between our Departments.

Pirated Material

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the annual cost to the British (a) film and (b) music industries of the distribution and sale of pirated material; and if he will make a statement. [90844]

Mr. Chris Smith: The recent launch of the Alliance Against Counterfeiting and Piracy (AACP) highlighted figures estimating a loss of revenue in 1998 of: (a) £120 million for the UK video industry (British Video Association research); and, (b) £10 million for the UK music industry (British Phonographic Industry/British Association of Record Dealers research), due to counterfeiting and piracy.

The Government are committed to the fight against counterfeiting and piracy. We welcome the formation of the AACP. My Department is working closely with colleagues in the FCO and DTI, to improve enforcement and to raise awareness of the value of intellectual property, such as through the Intellectual Property Rights Group of the Government's Creative Industries Task Force, as well as to encourage similar high standards in other countries, through trade negotiations.

HEALTH

Cancer Treatment

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much was spent by the NHS on drugs for cancer treatment in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement; [84243]

(2) if he will estimate the expenditure per head on oncology services (i) in total and (ii) by type of treatment in (a) the UK, (b) each EU country, (c) Canada, (d) the USA and (e) Japan in the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement; [84241]

(3) if he will list for each health authority the amount spent on (a) cancer treatment drugs, (b) radiography, (c) cancer surgery and (d) other cancer treatment for the last available year; and if he will make a statement; [84419]

(4) if he will list the total spending on oncology drugs for each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement; [86628]

(5) what studies his Department has undertaken into oncology drug funding by health authorities; and if he will make a statement; [86633]

(6) if he will list the per capita spending on oncology drugs for each health authority in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [86627]

Mr. Hutton: Cancer services are estimated to account for 6.3 per cent. (£1,479 million) of National Health Service hospital expenditure in England. The estimated population for England in 1998 was 49.44 million. This suggests expenditure on cancer services of £30 per head of population in England. Information on the cost per head by type of treatment in the United Kingdom and comparable expenditure per head for other countries is not available.

Information on expenditure per head on oncology services, expenditure on cancer treatment drugs, radiotherapy, cancer surgery and other cancer treatments and details of per capita spending on oncology drugs for each health authority is not available. The Department has not undertaken any studies into oncology drug funding by health authorities.

Information collected by the Department shows the net ingredient cost of drugs used in the treatment of cancer and dispensed in the community in England since 1992. This is shown in the table.

Expenditure on cancer drugs in England since 1992–97

£ million

	Net ingredient cost
1992	42.2
1993	46.9
1994	56.4
1995	65.4
1996	76.5

Notes:

1. Drugs used for the treatment of cancer are those described in the British National Formulary (September 1998 edition) sections 8.1, "Cytotoxic drugs", 8.2.4 "Interferons", 8.2.5 "aldesleukin" and 8.3 "sex hormones and hormone antagonists in malignant disease".

2. Some of these drugs may have been used to treat other conditions. It is not possible to separately identify those. In addition drugs other than those in the specified sections may have been used to treat cancer patients.

3. The data are from the Prescription Cost Analysis system and cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and dispensing doctors in England. Information on drugs dispensed in hospitals is not available.

4. The net ingredient cost is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.

Northern Devon Healthcare Trust

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will review the clinical indicator data for Northern Devon Healthcare Trust for 1997–98; [88071]

(2) what assessment he has made regarding Northern Devon Healthcare Trust's clinical performance in relation to that of other trusts; [88072]

(3) if he will make a statement about the quality of discharge data for 1997–98 clinical indicators for Northern Devon Healthcare Trust. [88070]

Mr. Denham: The capture of data and information is highly complex, and this is the first time National Health Service clinical indicators have been published at trust level, supporting one of the Government's main commitments to modernise the NHS and to improve the quality of the services delivered by hospitals and community and primary care services. Some data from some trusts and health authorities were more robust than others.

It is every trust's responsibility to ensure data are sent and received in good order. The Department will be working with all trusts to review the quality of the data provided and to agree actions for continuing improvement. A toolkit is also being developed with a clear purpose to support the interpretation and use of the indicators.

We do not propose to re-publish 1997–98 data this year. However, the 1997–98 data tables will be re-published in 2000 as part of the 1998–99 clinical indicator set.

Palliative Care

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will ensure that the new clinical guidance indicators cover palliative care in hospitals; [88668]

(2) what his Department is doing to ensure that hospitals fulfil their duty to ensure palliative care is delivered to a high quality in a hospital setting. [88665]

Mr. Hutton: In June 1998, the Department endorsed and distributed throughout the National Health Service, under Health Service Circular 1998/115, three documents of good practice in palliative care produced by the National Council for Hospice and Specialist Palliative Care Services, which were already widely used in the voluntary sector. One of these was "Palliative Care in the Hospital Setting", which describes key aspects of palliative care provision in the hospital setting.

The other two documents were "Guidelines for Managing Pain in Adults" and "Changing Gear—Guidelines for Managing the Last Days of Life in Adults".

The Department is currently working to develop national standards and performance indicators for cancer. This will include work on palliative care.

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many meetings of the JCC he has attended. [89275]

Ms Jowell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 362.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the guidance set out in EL 95/97 in respect of relapsing/remitting multiple sclerosis remains his Department's advice to health authorities. [89831]

Mr. Denham: Yes.

Orthopaedic Physiotherapy

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the average waiting period for orthopaedic physiotherapy by health authority in England. [89677]

Mr. Denham: Information on average waiting times for physiotherapy is not available centrally.

Drugs

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the estimated additional cost to the NHS of the use of branded drugs to generic drugs on the NHS category D list for the periods (a) June 1998 and (b) June 1999, assuming average dispensing levels for such drugs; [90054]

(2) what was the cost differential between the branded and generic versions of the drugs which appeared in the most recent NHS category D list. [90053]

Mr. Denham: Generic drugs are included in Category D of Part VIII of the Drug Tariff when community pharmacies are having difficulty obtaining supplies at the Drug Tariff price. Inclusion in Category D means that the price reimbursed to the pharmacy will be either the Drug Tariff price or, if the prescription is appropriately endorsed, the list price of the supplier from whom the drug was purchased. In some cases it may be necessary for the pharmacy to purchase a branded equivalent. For many of the drugs concerned there will be a wide range of suppliers—in some cases both branded and generic—and hence prices. This means that calculating the thousands of permutations of price differential between the various branded versions and their many generic equivalents could be done only at disproportionate cost.

Toxic Shock Syndrome

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to raise public awareness of toxic shock syndrome; and if he will make a statement. [89966]

Mr. Hutton: The Department works closely with the Toxic Shock Syndrome Information Service (TSSIS) to raise awareness of Toxic Shock Syndrome (TSS) among young people. The TSSIS provide a wide range of factual materials to increase awareness of TSS among both the public and the health profession. Earlier this year a joint mailing initiative was undertaken between the Department and the TSSIS to inform all media doctors and agony aunts of TSS. A letter about the work of the TSSIS and an information pack was sent out free of charge to enable them to advise their readers on the condition. Research by TSSIS suggests that awareness of TSS among young people is high.

In addition, the Absorbent Hygiene Products Manufacturers Association's Voluntary Code of Practice ensures that clear warnings about TSS are printed on the outside of every pack of tampons, and a leaflet inside the pack gives advice about the safe use of tampons and what to do if suspected TSS symptoms are experienced.

Training Standards

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures exist for NHS hospitals to ensure that staff training standards are consistently reviewed; and what performance targets are set. [90361]

Mr. Denham: Decisions regarding the training of National Health Service staff are most effectively taken by local employers. Local training and development plans should reflect nationally recognised standards for training and development, like Investors in People; guidance issued by the Department, like Modernising Health and Social Services: Developing the Workforce published under Health Service Circular 1999/111, and standards set by the regulatory bodies.

Essential Car User Allowance

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for NHS community midwives to be entitled to essential user car allowance; and if he will make a statement. [90645]

Mr. Denham: National Health Service community midwives who are employed on national terms and conditions may be already entitled to a Regular User allowance of up to £760 per annum in accordance with Section 24 of the General Whitley Council Handbook, copies of which are available in the Library. NHS trusts are free to determine their own arrangements for staff on local contracts.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91069]

Ms Jowell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 337.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90153]

Ms Jowell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calender year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which is replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he plans to respond to the letter of 24 May from the hon. Member for North Essex to the Prime Minister about cancer services in North Essex, which was referred to him by the Prime Minister's Office on 17 June; and if he will make a statement; [90544]

(2) when he plans to respond to the letters from the hon. Member for North Essex about cancer services in North Essex, dated 6 May; and if he will make a statement. [90543]

Ms Jowell: My noble Friend Baroness Hayman replied to the hon. Member on 9 July offering a meeting to discuss the services in North Essex.

NHS Direct

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many calls were made to the NHS Direct phone line in each of the last 12 months for which figures are available. [90957]

Mr. Denham: The information on the number of calls to NHS Direct for each of the last 12 months is shown in the table.

Cancer (Waste Incineration)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the information held by his Department on the incidence of cancers amongst people living in areas surrounding waste incinerators; and what recommendations his Department has made on emissions from incineration. [90353]

Ms Jowell: The study of cancer incidence near municipal solid waste incinerators, which was funded by this and five other Government Departments, was published in the British Journal of Cancer in 1996 (Elliott P., Shaddick G., Kleinschmidt I., Jolley D., Walls P., Beresford J. and Grundy C. (1996). Cancer incidence near municipal solid waste incinerators in Great Britain. British Journal of Cancer, volume 73, pp 702–710). This study found no evidence of an excess incidence of most of the cancer types studied among populations living near incinerators, although an excess incidence of liver cancer was reported. Because of particular problems with the accurate diagnosis of liver cancer, the Department has funded a further study to review the diagnosis of the liver cancer cases found in this study. The results of this study will be published in due course.

The Department does not make specific recommendations on emissions from incineration. However, the Department works closely with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, which has lead policy responsibility for industrial emissions controls, and also with the Environment Agency, which has regulatory responsibility for Integrated Pollution Control.

Prodigy

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made regarding the ability of Prodigy to deliver the latest practical clinical guidance. [90248]

Mr. Denham: The recommended treatments in Prodigy have been chosen on the basis of clinical effectiveness, safety and appropriateness, and take account of existing national or well-recognised guidelines, where these are appropriate to general medical practice. When new products are introduced, they are added to the Prodigy system if appropriate and as soon as is practical. The commissioning and maintenance of the Prodigy guidance will come under the overview of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE). Details of how NICE will take this forward will be published in due course.

Investing in Dentistry

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dental practices in England have benefited from the Investing in Dentistry initiative. [90953]

Mr. Denham: The Investing in Dentistry initiative ended in April this year. 301 Investing in Dentistry funding requests have been approved, primarily to help towards the cost of opening of new dental practices, relocating practices to larger premises, and providing extra surgeries in areas where there have been problems of access to National Health Service dentistry. A number of applications are currently being assessed. The applications approved so far will provide over 700,000 patients with the opportunity to access NHS dental services.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his oral Statement of 6 July 1999, Official Report, columns 821–23, what plans he has to replace the Investing in Dentistry scheme. [90539]

Mr. Denham: We are currently reviewing possible options on how best to use the resources available to build on the success of the Investing in Dentistry initiative in improving access to National Health Service dental services. A dental strategy is due to be published later this year.

Fittleworth Medical Ltd.

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the reasons why payments from the Barnsley Health Authority to Fittleworth Medical Ltd. were withheld on the advice of the Prescription Pricing Authority. [90808]

Mr. Denham: I understand that Barnsley Health Authority has not withheld payments from Fittleworth Medical Ltd.

Carers Grant

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by authority the amounts awarded under the Carers Grant for 1999–2000. [90517]

Mr. Hutton: The Promoting Independence: Carers Special Grant Allocations 1999–2000 are set out in Annex A of Special Grant Report (No. 44), a copy of which was laid before the House of Commons on 23 March 1999. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

Waiting Lists (Suffolk)

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were on the hospital waiting list for the Suffolk Health Authority area; and what was the average length of time spent on the waiting list (a) in May 1999 and (b) in May 1997. [90452]

Mr. Denham: The information available is given in the table.

Figures for May 1997 are not available as information was collected on a quarterly basis until April 1998.

DEFENCE

Submarine Upgrade

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to upgrade submarines, in addition to HMS Splendid, to carry Tomahawk missiles. [91153]

Mr. George Robertson: HMS Triumph will be upgraded to carry Tomahawk land attack missiles in autumn 1999, followed by HMS Trafalgar and HMS Spartan next year. Longer term plans are that the full fleet of 10 nuclear powered submarines will be upgraded to carry TLAM by 2008.

Gulf War (Post-traumatic Stress Disorder)

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians were seconded to the armed forces during the Gulf Crisis; and, of those, how many are known to be suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. [84952]

Mr. Doug Henderson [pursuant to his reply, 8 June 1999, c. 209]: I regret that some of the information in my answer was incorrect. The last sentence of my answer should have read:

"As at 26 May 1999, 14 civilian contractors who worked in the Gulf had been seen by MAP physicians. The total number of civilians seen by the MAP at that date was 77."

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 148, on the radio programme "Costing the Earth", if he will place in the Library a copy of the Minister of State's contribution; and what assessment he has made of the (a) extent and (b) consequences of the use of depleted uranium ammunition. [87896]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 24 June 1999]: As I indicated in my reply of 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 148, we did not tape the BBC Radio 4 programme "Costing the Earth" which was broadcast on 7 June. I am advised by the BBC's Copyright Adviser that if the Library of the House requires copies of the transcript of the broadcast, which would include my contribution to the programme, it should apply in writing to: BBC Information, Broadcasting House, Portland Place, London, W1A 1AA.

The potential hazards of depleted uranium (DU) are well understood and documented in scientific literature. The Ministry of Defence itself has published two reports on depleted uranium. In 1993, the Defence Radiological Protection Service published a summary report of its assessment of the potential hazards posed by depleted uranium; and in March this year I published a paper entitled "Testing for the presence of depleted uranium in UK veterans of the Gulf conflict: The Current Position". Copies of those documents have already been placed in the Library of the House.

Army Personnel

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what targets he has set for the speed and accuracy of salary payments by the Reserves Manning and Career Management Division in Glasgow; and if he will make a statement. [88870]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 29 June 1999]: The Territorial Army and Reserves Manning and Career Management Division of the Army Personnel Centre (APC) in Glasgow is not responsible for the payment of the salaries of Territorial Army or Reserve Forces personnel. Responsibility for pay record administration rests with the appropriate Pay Division within the Personnel, Pay and Pensions Administration (PPPA) Directorate of the APC. The performance target for the creation of an accurate Pay Account is 92 per cent. created within five working days of notification of enlistment, commission or conversion from a reserve to a regular or mobilised engagement.

Once an accurate and timely pay account has been created, the responsibility for the delivery of pay rests with the Armed Forces Personnel Administration Agency (AFPAA) in the case of bank payments, and Unit administration offices in the case of cash payments. AFPAA's key target for 1999–2000 in respect of pay delivery requires 100 per cent. of payments to be made by the due date, with errors not exceeding 2.5 per 1,000 payments.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) military, (b) retired military and (c) civilian personnel, by rank or grade are employed at (i) the Reserve Training and Mobilisation Centre at Chilwell and (ii) the Reserve Manning and Career Management Division in the Army Personnel Centre, Glasgow; and how many in each category have experience of employment in (1) the private sector and (2) the public sector other than in their current employment. [88871]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 29 June 1999]: As at 28 June 1999, the details requested by number, grade and previous employment experience were as listed in the tables.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is on liaison between (a) the Reserves Manning and Career Management Division in Glasgow and (b) the Reserve Training and Mobilisation Centre at Chilwell and the employers of TA volunteers and regular reservists; and if he will make a statement. [88869]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 29 June 1999]: The Army Personnel Centre, Manning and Career Management (TA and Reserves) Division, is responsible for making payments to employers under the financial assistance arrangements set out in the Reserve Forces (Call-out and Recall) (Financial Assistance) Regulations (SI 1997/309). It therefore has contact with all employers whose employees have been called out for permanent military service. The Army Personnel Centre also has contact with employers on other matters related to the call-out of an individual. The Reserve Training and Mobilisation Centre at Chilwell is not expected to have contact with employers as a matter of course but there may be occasional contact to resolve particular administrative matters or to pass on information.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90154]

Mr. Spellar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999 Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Service Aircraft

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what percentage of the FADEC software was rewritten, and when, prior to the Chinook Mk 2's release into service; [89945]

(2) if he will list the incidents involving electrical problems on Chinook helicopters between 1992 and 1996; [89969]

(3) on what occasions the findings of gross negligence against the pilots of a Chinook helicopter which crashed on the Mull of Kintyre in 1994 have been reviewed; by whom; and if he will publish the findings of the review; [89943]

(4) if he will list the occasions when his Department discounted pilot error as a cause of an aircraft crash which involved fatalities in the last 10 years; [90082]

(5) if he will list the software design and systems integration problems experienced from February to July 1994 as referred to in a note by the Assistant Director, Helicopter Projects on 11 January 1995; [89944]

(6) if he will list the occasions in the last 15 years when a service aircraft crashed because of an uncommanded flight manoeuvre without pilot error; [90083]

(7) what reports his Department has received from the United States Army about the FADEC-equipped Chinook which crashed in the US in March 1996; [89962]

(8) if the Aeroplane and Armament Experimental Establishment was able to read FADEC software without the use of automated tools prior to the crash of a Chinook helicopter on the Mull of Kintyre in June 1994; [89946]

(9) what guarantees his Department received from EDS-SCICON that it found the FADEC software on the Chinook Mk 2 to be satisfactory. [90081]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I will write, and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Gurkhas (Pension Entitlements)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what review he is conducting of the war pension entitlements of Gurkha soldiers following the death of Sergeant Balaram Rai in Kosovo; when he expects to complete his review; and if he will make a statement. [89897]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 6 July 1999]: As I announced on 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 471, I have set up a group to examine Gurkha pensions and gratuities. I will chair the group which will take into account all aspects of Gurkha pensions and gratuities within the context of the Tri-Partite Agreement between Nepal, India and the UK. I expect the work to be completed by the end of the year.

Military Records (Balkans)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what orders have been given and arrangements put in hand for the repatriation, cataloguing and storage of (a) paper-based and (b) electronic records of (i) the allied rapid reaction corps since its deployment from Germany to Macedonia and Kosovo and (ii) every British military unit since their deployment as part of joint allied operations in Kosovo, Macedonia, Albania, Serbia and Montenegro. [90260]

Mr. George Robertson: There are long-standing procedures already in place, set out in Service Instructions, which cover the creation and return to MOD UK of appropriate records of operational deployments by British forces. MOD is of course in touch with British forces in the Balkan theatre on this matter.

Such records, whether in paper or electronic format, once returned to the United Kingdom are handled in accordance with the Department's standard procedures to make them available for MOD purposes, and for subsequent archiving and consideration for eventual transfer to the Public Record Office in accordance with the Public Records Acts 1958 and 1967.

The Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps is however a NATO force; accordingly the treatment of the records from HQ ARRC itself must also reflect NATO requirements.

Married Quarters

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the sum of £100 million set aside from the proceeds of the sale of the married quarters estate to Annington Homes Ltd. in 1996 for the refurbishment and upgrading of married quarters remains outside and additional to the Defence budget. [90626]

Mr. Spellar: The £100 million additional funding derived from the proceeds of the married quarters estate to Annington Homes Ltd. in 1996 was added to the Defence Programme at the time of the sale. This funding is ringfenced and on current expenditure plans is expected to have been fully utilised by FY 2002–03.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much of the £100 million earmarked from the sale of the married quarters estate has been (a) spent and (b) committed to be spent on upgrading and refurbishment of married quarters in each year from 1996 to 2002 inclusive. [90630]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as follows:

Year	£ million

1997–98	20.0
1998–99	20.0
Committed
1999–2000	20.0

Year	£ million
Balance uncommitted
2000–01	20.0

MOD Police

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes he has made to the Ministry of Defence Police regulations since 30 March 1998. [89388]

Mr. Doug Henderson: None. However, changes to the MDP Complaints and Discipline regulations, in parallel with those introduced for Home Department Police Forces, are currently subject to consultation with interested parties.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to ensure his Department's computer systems are millennium compliant; how many officials of his Department are tasked on the issue and how many of them are technically qualified; and how many consultancy staff are supplementing in-house resources. [89824]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence has a comprehensive Year 2000 programme, which has been in place since 1996. The focus of the programme is on the maintenance of Defence capability across the millennium period. Around 75 per cent. of MOD critical systems are now compliant, with the remainder due to be made compliant and tested by the end of the year.

There are currently approximately 1,170 full and part-time officials working on Y2K within MOD, with 215 consultants supplementing the in-house staff. All have the skills necessary for the tasks allocated to them.

A programme of audits, using both internal and external specialist assessors, has been established to assure the quality of the work undertaken. A series of exercises is underway to demonstrate the adequacy of technical compliance measures and contingency.

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 30 June, on DERA, if his public/private partnership proposals for DERA will permit it to borrow freely on the private financial market. [89811]

Mr. Spellar: No decisions have been made on the future of DERA. If the outcome of the DERA Public Private Partnership study is that we establish DERA as a private company, it would have freedom of access to the private capital markets like any other private company.

RNAS Culdrose

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research his Department has evaluated on the effects of noise pollution caused by operations directed from RNAS Culdrose in Cornwall. [90245]

Mr. Spellar: A noise survey was undertaken in 1996 at RNAS Culdrose and noise levels caused by the air operations at the station were measured. A noise map was produced from the survey and used to identify those homes that qualified for a grant under the MOD's voluntary noise insulation grant scheme. In addition, MOD has sponsored or reviewed a number of research studies on the effects of noise pollution which, although not specific to RNAS Culdrose, are generally applicable to air operations.

Empty Properties

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's houses or flats there are in the Borough of Oadby and Wigston which are unoccupied; of that number, how many there are for which his Department has no immediate plans to use for military personnel and their families; and what plans his Department has to (a) lend, lease or otherwise dispose of these dwellings to a housing association, the borough council or other landlords for civilian rented use and (b) sell the freehold. [90243]

Mr. Spellar: MOD currently has a stock of 64 Service Families Quarters at South Wigston which are owned by Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL) and underleased from them by the Defence Housing Executive (DHE). DHE plans to release 34 of these properties back to AHL in December 1999. It will then be for AHL to decide the future of these properties. An estate of 30 properties for use by Service families will remain. Of these seven properties are currently unoccupied, although three will shortly be occupied by Service families.

Armed Forces Personnel Debate

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will write to the hon. Member for Solihull on the matters raised in the debate on Armed Forces Personnel, 1 July 1999, Official Report, columns 464–534. [90262]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Yes, I will write very shortly, and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Aircraft Sorties (Iraq)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties have been undertaken by British aircraft over Iraq since 1 January. [90142]

Mr. George Robertson: RAF aircraft undertook some 1,600 operational sorties in the period 1 January to 30 June 1999 in pursuit of their mission to prevent Saddam's air forces from persecuting the Kurds and Shia Muslims of northern and southern Iraq. The figure includes sorties by aircraft such as VC10 tankers which, although directly involved in this mission, did not enter Iraqi airspace.

Centre for Defence Medicine

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the NHS trusts that expressed interest in becoming the host for the Centre for Defence Medicine. [90627]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Eighteen Hospital Trusts expressed an interest in becoming the host for the Centre for Defence Medicine by responding to a Pre-Qualification Questionnaire. The full list is as follows:

Frimley Park Hospital NHS Trust
Guy's and St. Thomas' Hospital Trust
Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust
North Bristol NHS Trust
North Glasgow University Hospitals NHS Trust
Northern General Hospital NHS Trust (Sheffield)
Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals
Peterborough Hospitals NHS Trust
Plymouth Hospitals NHS Trust
Salisbury Healthcare NHS Trust
St. Richard's Hospital, The Royal West Sussex Trust
Swindon and Marlborough NHS Trust
The Lothian University Hospitals Trust (Edinburgh)
The Newcastle-upon-Tyne Hospitals NHS Trust
The Royal Hospitals Trust
The University College London Hospitals Trust
University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust University Hospital NHS Trust (Nottingham).

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Waste

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what actions are taken by his Department to restrict price fluctuations of waste (a) glass, (b) paper and (c) household metal waste. [90349]

Dr. Howells: These wastes constitute potential secondary raw materials and internationally-traded commodities which compete with virgin supplies. Their prices are best set by the operation of the market rather than by Government. However, we are committed to increasing recycling rates and consider the development of new and stable markets for recycled materials as being key to achieving this objective. A range of options for action which might assist in this process have been identified for the DTI by the Recycling Advisory Unit at AEA Technology plc, in a report entitled "Development of Markets for Recycled Materials", and these will be considered in tandem with the recently-published recommendations of DETR's Market Development Group.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list for each of the past 10 years the total of energy produced by waste incineration; how many incinerators were operating in each of those years; and what is his Department's estimate of the fuel efficiency of incinerators compared to coal, gas and nuclear generation. [90352]

Mr. Battle: Eleven energy from waste projects contracted under the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation arrangements in England and Wales generated almost 981 GW hours of electricity in 1998 and in so doing derived value from about 2 million tonnes of waste and made around 100,000 tonnes of ferrous metals available for recycling. These facilities operated with an average load factor in excess of 80 per cent.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91070]

Mr. Byers: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 307.

Credit Card Fraud (Mobile Telephones)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on the adequacy of arrangements to detect and prevent credit card fraud by users of pay-as-you-go mobile telephones. [90447]

Mr. Wills: I am aware of some cases where credit cards have been used fraudulently to buy additional minutes for pre-paid mobile phones. I understand that the mobile phone operators have taken measures to prevent such use of credit cards and continue to implement tighter controls. While I am not aware of any representations being made to the DTI on this issue, I shall keep it under review.

Textphones

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 28 June 1999, Official Report, column 33, concerning public textphones, what factors underlie the difference between the figures provided and those in the answer of 17 November 1997, Official Report, column 52; what assessment he has made of British Telecom's plans to increase provision by 2000; what were the results of the Oftel consultation; and what plans there are for the further consultation exercise. [90451]

Mr. Wills: The difference between the figures given in 1997 and in my answer of 28 June lies in variations in the needs of establishments which public textphone users frequent, and numbers fluctuate marginally over time. BT's plans in 1997 to increase numbers of public textphones by 2000 have been superseded by Oftel's subsequent consultation on improving telecommunications services for people with disabilities. BT is discussing future needs with disability groups.

Following the consultation, Oftel has recommended that the Secretary of State introduce new regulatory requirements including requirements for public textphones. The Government are planning to consult later this year on measures to improve access to telecommunications for the disabled.

Inward Investment (South-West)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the level of inward investment into the South West Government Office region for the last five years for which figures are available. [90962]

Mr. Wills: The following figures are based on information provided by companies at the time of the announcement of the decision to invest in the UK. They are based on the companies' best estimate, at that time, of the number of jobs to be created/safeguarded by the investment in its first three years.

There is no requirement to notify the Department and so the figures include only those projects where the Department's Invest in Britain Bureau and its regional partners were involved or which have come to their notice. Comprehensive capital expenditure details are often not available at the time of the decision to invest, and are therefore not included.

Region/year	Number of projects	Total number new jobs	Total number safeguarded jobs	Total number associated jobs
South West
1993–94	12	1,065	1,112	2,117
1994–95	21	1,366	707	2,093
1995–96	17	1,718	2,582	4,300
1996–97	30	2,304	8,928	11,232
1997–98	40	3,205	1,735	4,940

Edmonton Incinerator

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what inquiries have been held by his Department into the future expansion of the Edmonton incinerator. [90354]

Mr. Battle: My Department is currently considering an application under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to extend the Edmonton energy from waste power station. As part of that consideration we are obliged to take into action the views of statutory consultees such as the relevant local planning authority and the Environment Agency, as well as other representations and comments made.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) representations and (b) information on public consultations he has received on the future of the Edmonton incinerator. [90355]

Mr. Battle: My Department has received over 40 representations on the application under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to extend the Edmonton energy from waste power station. The applicant, local planning authority and the Environment Agency have all carried out public consultations on the application.

Honda, Swindon

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Government financial support was (a) requested and (b) given for Honda's investment in Swindon announced on 6 July. [90545]

Mr. Battle: There was no Government financial support requested or given for Honda's further investment in their Swindon plant.

Agency Steering Board

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if private sector representatives on the Agency Steering Board will be remunerated. [90298]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 8 July 1999]: Private sector representatives on Agency Steering Boards are not remunerated, but receive an honorarium.

Enterprise Council

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if members of the Enterprise Council will be remunerated. [90297]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 8 July 1999]: No decision has been taken. The proposal to create the Enterprise Council, its composition and related matters are covered by the consultation exercise currently underway on the Small Business Service.

Small Business Service

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to advertise the post of the Small Business Service Chief Executive. [90296]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 8 July 1999]: We are hoping to advertise the post of Chief Executive of the Small Business Service in the near future. The post will be publicly advertised.

Insolvency and Bankruptcy

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to abolish the floating charge. [90329]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 8 July 1999]: A re-assessment of the relative rights and remedies of secured creditors in insolvencies, including the position of creditors secured by floating charges, is part of the Terms of Reference of the Joint Department of Trade and Industry and HM Treasury Review of Company Rescue Mechanisms which I announced on 2 February 1999, Official Report, column 580. It was subsequently agreed that the review should make a final report by the end of 1999.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes he intends to make in respect of (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) Customs and Excise as priority creditors in bankruptcy cases. [90330]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 8 July 1999]: A re-assessment of the position of the Crown as a preferential creditor in insolvencies is part of the Terms of Reference of the Joint Department of Trade and Industry and HM Treasury Review of Company Rescue Mechanisms which I announced on 2 February 1999, Official Report, column 580. It was subsequently agreed that the review should make a final report by the end of 1999.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will define responsible risk-takers for the purpose of proposed changes in bankruptcy law; and if he will make a statement. [90331]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 8 July 1999]: I intend to issue a consultation document on this issue in the future.

Street Lighting

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department will publish the results of the consultation on competition in connections in the street lighting sector. [90382]

Mr. Battle: The consultation was carried out by the Office of Gas and Electricity Markets (OFGEM). I understand that it is OFGEM's intention to publish a follow up document, outlining their proposals resulting from the consultation, in the near future.

Financial Services Industry

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future role of the Office of Fair Trading in the monitoring of the financial services industry. [R] [89319]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 1 July 1999]: The duties of the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) in relation to the financial services industry under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 will not change under the Financial Services and Markets Bill. When the prohibitions in the Competition Act 1998 come into force on 1 March 2000, agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings, and concerted practices which may affect trade in the UK and have as their object and effect the restriction, distortion or prevention of competition will be prohibited subject to certain exclusions. Any conduct on the part of one or more undertakings which amounts to the abuse of a dominant position affecting trade within the UK and which may affect trade in the UK will also be prohibited. These prohibitions will apply to the financial services industry subject to certain exemptions and exclusions. The DGFT will have powers to carry out investigations if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting either of these prohibitions has been infringed, to bring infringements to an end, and to impose penalties. The DGFT will continue to scrutinise the rules of the Financial Services Authority, self regulatory organisations, investment exchanges and clearing houses using his powers in section 122 of the Financial Services Act 1986 and will report to the Treasury on any that appear to him to restrict, distort or prevent competition to a significant extent.

Photovoltaic Energy

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to encourage the development of the generation of electricity from photovoltaic roofing tiles; and if he will make a statement. [89189]

Mr. Battle: Photovoltaic (PV) systems which may be incorporated into the fabric of buildings offer the prospect of clean and silent electricity production and are a form of renewable energy which is clearly suited to an urban environment. However there are a number of barriers to the deployment of PV, of which the most significant is the current high cost of the modules. My Department is working with the PV industry to reduce the barriers. In February I announced three new PV initiatives: a call for R&D proposals for components and systems; a field trial of 100 domestic PV systems and the design of a scheme to demonstrate PV on large commercial and industrial buildings. A total of 28 responses to the call for proposals have been received, of which 14 are related to building integrated PV. In addition there are two PV roofing product development projects currently underway with support from DTI. The domestic PV field trial scheme is currently under discussion with the industry. I hope to make an announcement regarding the third initiative later in the year.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Parliament

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of the opening of the Scottish Parliament on 1 July. [89926]

Dr. Reid: The costs which will be borne directly by the Scottish Office, the Scottish Executive and the Scottish Parliament Corporate body are expected to be in the region of £670,000. Some invoices have yet to be received and therefore the final cost cannot be identified at present.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, for each local authority in Scotland, the gross (a) contribution to and (b) receipts from the non-domestic rates pool for 1998–99. [90093]

Mr. Macdonald: The information requested is given in the table. As the non-domestic rates pool operates across years, contributions and receipts are not directly comparable in any single year. The pool ensures that each authority receives its share of central government support (Aggregate External Finance) each year according to its relative need as assessed by Grant Aided Expenditure levels.

Dr. Reid: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90162]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Public Records

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will take steps to encourage communications between members of the public who make use of the facilities provided by the Public Record Office and individual members of the Advisory Council on Public Records about those facilities. [90169]

Mr. Vaz: For some years the Council has published information about itself and a list of members, with an invitation to communicate with the secretary, on notice boards at the Public Record Office in Kew and the Family Records Centre in Islington and on the Advisory Council's pages on the Public Record Office website.

Some members of the public who are users of the Public Record Office facilities have communicated with members in order to bring matters of concern to them to the attention of the Council.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what guidance the Lord Chancellor has issued since May 1997 to members of the Advisory Council on Public Records on the provisions of (i) Instrument No. 12 (Access to Public Records) of 1966, and (ii) the Census (Confidentiality) Act 1991. [90170]

Mr. Vaz: None.

Separation of Powers

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what further safeguards the Lord Chancellor plans to introduce to prevent political influence over matters which are properly the province of the judiciary. [90538]

Mr. Vaz: None. The judiciary are not subject to political influence. Their independence is already fully protected by long-standing laws and convention and by the office of Lord Chancellor.

Court Case Adjournments

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps his Department takes to monitor the extent to which cases before the courts are adjourned; what statistics he collects on the subject; and what plans he has to limit the use of adjournments or to monitor more closely how adjournments are used. [90311]

Mr. Vaz: Information on the number of ineffective Crown Court trials is kept, but no central reports on adjournments is collected for civil cases. Applications for cases to be adjourned are varied and adjournments in both civil and criminal cases are judicial decisions in which I cannot intervene. However, since 26 April 1999, there are systems in the civil courts, which monitor adjournments of cases listed for trial and the reasons for adjournment. The whole ethos of the Civil Procedure Rules is that defended cases are managed by the court and adjournments are the exception.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Funding

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 11 June 1999, Official Report, column 437, on local authority funding, if he will place in the Library tables in paper and machine-readable form which exclude the contributions of local authorities from the amounts set out in his previous answer but are otherwise consistent with that answer. [90449]

Ms Estelle Morris: Details of the revenue grants within aggregate external finance other than revenue support grant for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, for each local education authority, each class of local authority and for England as a whole are given in tables that have been placed in the Library in paper and machine-readable form. The figures shown in the tables exclude contributions made by local education authorities.

(10) if he will list actual and planned expenditure in each of the last three financial years by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies on (a) market research, (b) conferences, (c) direct mail, (d) advertising, publicity and publications, (e) opinion polling, (f) web sites, (g) hospitality, (h) central administration costs and (i) external consultants and advisers in relation to (i) early years training and development for three and four year olds, (ii) early excellence centres, (iii) national literacy strategy in primary schools, (iv) national numeracy strategy in primary schools, (v) nursery education grant and (vi) family literacy. [90553]

Ms Estelle Morris: A reply to these questions would involve disproportionate cost. General information on expenditure by the Department for Education and Employment, agencies and non-departmental public bodies is given in the annual Departmental Records, copies of which are held in the Library.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90157]

Mr. Mudie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he intends to reply to the letters to him dated 30 March, 29 April and 4 June from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. Pat McGuinness. [90592]

Mr. Mudie: A letter in response to all three letters was dispatched to the hon. Member on 8 July 1999.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Turkey

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Turkey concerning the death penalty passed on Abdullah Ocalan; and if he will make a statement. [90347]

Ms Quin: We endorse the declaration of 29 June by the EU Presidency, which reflected member states' opposition to capital punishment as a matter of principle, irrespective of the defendant and the offence of which he is convicted. I raised our opposition to capital punishment with senior officials from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on 7 June, and will do so again during my visit to Turkey this month.

Jordan

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Government's policy regarding freedom of trade between Jordan and the West Bank. [R] [90335]

Mr. Hoon: Trade between Jordan and the West Bank and Jordan and Israel is of central importance to increasing stability and prosperity. The Government support the European Community's Association Agreements with Jordan, Israel and the PLO, and the Euromed process which promotes regional economic and commercial integration. The Government are pressing for further examination of ways to increase trade within the region.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current level of military assistance to Jordan. [R] [90333]

Mr. Hoon: Our budget for the current financial year for military assistance to Jordan is £450,000. This will largely be spent on courses and Short Term Training Teams.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received about the effects of the sanctions on Iraq on the Jordanian economy. [R] [90334]

Mr. Hoon: The Jordanian authorities regularly raise their concern about the effects that sanctions on Iraq have on the Jordanian economy, while continuing to call for Iraq to comply fully with UN Security Council resolutions.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the United Kingdom has taken to assist the Jordanian Government with debt relief. [R] [90332]

Mr. Hoon: We promised King Abdullah to raise debt relief for Jordan with our G8 partners, and did so ahead of, and at, the recent Summit in Cologne. That Summit concluded by calling on the international community to provide economic assistance (for Jordan), including, where appropriate, debt relief. The UK strongly supported the Paris Club decision to reschedule Jordanian debt.

Jerusalem

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the human rights situation in Jerusalem. [R] [90340]

Mr. Hoon: Concern for human rights forms an essential part of our policy on the Peace Process. Our Missions in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem monitor the situation closely, including through contacts with NGOs. The UK and the EU regularly raise human rights issues with the Israeli authorities. We also support projects aimed at promoting human rights in Jerusalem through our Consulate General and the British Council. Finally we also raise concerns with the Palestinian Authority about human rights infringements in areas under their authority.

Drought (Middle East)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the problem of drought in the Middle East. [R] [90336]

Mr. Hoon: There is a drought this year affecting the whole of the Middle East. Rainfall is down to a third of normal levels—reportedly the lowest it has been for at least thirty years. It is not possible to assess at this stage whether this year's low rainfall is an anomaly.

The Department for International Development have prepared an assessment of the drought in the Middle East, a copy of which will shortly be in the House of Commons Library.

Geneva Convention

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the convening of a meeting of the high-contracting parties to the Geneva Convention in July; and if he will list the issues which Her Majesty's Government intends to raise. [R] [90339]

Mr. Hoon: In the period to the convening of a meeting of the high-contracting parties to the Geneva Convention, the highest priority will be to support the efforts of all direct parties to the Peace Process to make progress in the negotiations.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit the Middle East. [90342]

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no firm plans to visit the Middle East in the near future though such options are kept under review.

Israel

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Israeli Government about the implementation of the E1 plan and the expansion of the Ma'ale Adumin settlement. [R] [90338]

Mr. Hoon: We have indicated to the Israeli Government our concern that Israeli settlement building and access road construction in the Occupied Territories is an obstacle to peace. We shall continue to do so. Meanwhile, we welcome the stated commitment in Prime Minister Barak's coalition guidelines that no new settlements will be created pending the outcome of the final status negotiations.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect of recent Israeli attacks on Lebanon. [R] [90341]

Mr. Hoon: We were concerned at the recent Hizbullah attacks on northern Israel and the subsequent Israeli bombing of Lebanon. We have made representations to urge all parties to show restraint and to respect the April Understandings.

Ascension Island

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason he has decided not to charge the United States for the use of Wideawake Airfield on Ascension Island for civil charter flights. [90521]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United States Base on Ascension is provided free from rent and charges under the terms of the 1956 Agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States America Concerning the Extension of the Bahamas Long Range Proving Ground by the Establishment of the Additional Sites in Ascension Island, as amended. The Base is used by the United States Space Command.

The 1956 Agreement provides that commercial aircraft shall not be authorised to operate from any of the Sites except in accordance with the provision of an agreement between the UK and US Governments. We are shortly to begin negotiating an Agreement with the US Government which would allow the use of Wideawake by civil flights not engaged in scheduled international air services. This will not affect either the United Kingdom's or the United States' use of Wideawake for military purposes.

Our proposals anticipate that any civil airline operator who wished to use Wideawake would be expected to pay to do so. If, after amending the 1956 Agreement to allow civil flights into Ascension, a United States carrier did wish to operate civil charter flights to the airfield, we anticipate that they would be charged the same rate as other civil operators.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy to allow countries, other than the United States of America, the use of Wideawake Airfield on Ascension Island for civil charter flights. [90522]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United States Base on Ascension is provided under the terms of the Agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America Concerning the Extension of the Bahamas Long Range Proving Ground by the Establishment of the Additional Sites in Ascension Island, as amended. This Agreement entered into force in 1956.

We are shortly to begin negotiating a further Agreement with the US Government which would allow the use of Wideawake by civil flights not engaged in scheduled international air services. Subject to this, we would envisage also allowing civil air operators from countries other than the UK or US to use Wideawake.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90164]

Mr. Hoon: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06 which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the timescales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

East Timor

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans are being prepared by his Department for the monitoring of the referendum on the future Government of East Timor; and if he will make a statement. [90344]

Mr. Hoon: EU member states will be sending a team of observers to the UN supervised consultation in East Timor.

Diplomatic Posts (Locally Engaged Staff)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the locally engaged staff in the British Embassies or High Commissions in (a) China, (b) Brazil, (c) India, (d) Indonesia, (e) Pakistan and (f) Nigeria who are paid less than the United Kingdom national minimum wage, together with their hourly salary expressed in the Sterling equivalent. [90640]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This information is not held centrally. To obtain it from the diplomatic posts concerned would involve disproportionate cost.

Guatemala

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to send observers from the United Kingdom to monitor the election in Guatemala in November 1999. [90345]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are giving careful consideration, in consultation with other member states of the European Union, as to how we might best respond to any invitation from the appropriate Guatemalan authorities to participate in election monitoring.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have been held by staff of the British Embassy in Guatemala with political parties and human rights groups concerning the conduct of the elections due to be held in November. [90346]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Ambassador and his staff are in regular contact with politicians, human rights workers and senior election officials about the forthcoming elections. These will be an important step in Guatemala's peace process and the strengthening of democratic institutions.

British Council

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the loss of Department for International Development contract work to the British Council on his Department's operations in developing countries. [90634]

Mr. Hoon: The British Council continues to manage most existing DFID contracts. The lack of new contracts for which to bid will have a progressive effect on the British Council's operation in developing countries over the next few years. The FCO will be working with the British Council and DFID to achieve the most effective co-operation possible in their work in developing countries.

Treaty of Utrecht

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the Government's policy to abide by all the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht. [90939]

Ms Quin: The agreement signed in 1713 and known as the Treaty of Utrecht was part of a series of treaties which ended the War of the Spanish Succession. The full Treaty contained provisions relating to a wide range of areas and issues, many of which are no longer applicable.

British title to the Rock of Gibraltar is based on Article X of the Treaty. In determining title to the Rock, this remains binding under international law upon the two parties, the UK and Spain. Both parties have so conducted themselves for many years.

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 June 1999, Official Report, column 255, for what reason the reports of working groups on legislative proposals are not published for scrutiny prior to decision. [88681]

Ms Quin: Government Departments inform Parliamentary scrutiny committees of legislative proposals through the submission of Explanatory Memorandums. These outline the draft proposal, the impact on UK law and the Government's policy towards it.

The Council's Rules of Procedure state that "deliberations of the Council shall be covered by the obligation of professional secrecy".

This covers preparatory meetings such as COREPER and Council working groups.

The Government are, however, committed to the effective parliamentary scrutiny of EU legislative proposals. Departments therefore usually aim to give the scrutiny committees as full a read-out of negotiations as possible while respecting the Council's confidentiality.

Cyprus

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his efforts to find a settlement of the situation in Cyprus. [90141]

Ms Quin: We remain determined to see a major, sustained effort this year in support of the UN Secretary-General's initiative to secure a just and lasting settlement in Cyprus.

G8 Heads of Government, in their statement of 20 June, and the UN Security Council, in its resolution 1250 of 29 June, have urged UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan to invite the leaders of both Cypriot sides to enter without preconditions into comprehensive negotiations starting in the Autumn, and to commit themselves in good faith to continue to negotiate until a settlement is reached. As a G8 member and a permanent member of the UN Security Council, the UK has been closely involved in this process. The Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary confirmed to Mr. Annan, during his visit to London on 24–25 June, that he will have our full support in efforts to get negotiations underway.

China

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on China's human rights record since 1 July 1997. [90134]

Mr. Hoon: Since July 1997 China has taken several positive steps which will bring about closer co-operation with UN human rights mechanisms. These include signature of the international covenants on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Civil and Political Rights, and agreement to report to the UN under those covenants in respect of Hong Kong. It has received visits by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and the UN working Group on Arbitrary detention, as well as allowing a visit to Tibet by EU Troika Ambassadors. It has also extended an invitation to visit to the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture. We have been able to discuss issues of serious concern including the death penalty, religion, Tibet and individual cases in our EU and UK/China dialogues. China has also begun to work with the UK and EU on human rights co-operation programmes. Through dialogue we are pressing for further positive steps, including early ratification and implementation of the international covenants, changes on the death penalty and detention regimes.

Kosovo

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the deadline for sending an international police task force to Kosovo; and how many of the planned international police task force have arrived to Kosovo. [90130]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: It was agreed at the Friends of the UN Secretary-General for Kosovo meeting in New York on 30 June that the United Nations Mission in Kosovo should acquire the capacity to take over responsibility for policing from KFOR as soon as possible. As of 1 July, 2,400 police had been pledged to the United Nations, out of the total 3,110 required. The UN has already deployed an advance party of 39 police officers to Kosovo to establish a headquarters and to liaise with KFOR. It is expected that the main component of the UN Police Force will start to deploy from 17 July.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many police officers from the UN mission in Bosnia have been deployed to Kosovo. [90131]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As of 7 July, 37 police officers had been transferred from the International Police Task Force in Bosnia to the UN Police Force in Kosovo. A further 40 will follow soon.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the deadline for (a) appointing the UN Secretary General's special representative to Kosovo and (b) appointing five regional administrators to Kosovo. [90129]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The UN Secretary-General announced on 2 July the appointment of Bernard Kouchner as his Special Representative to head the United Nations Mission in Kosovo. He has also announced Kouchner's five deputies: Jack Covey as Principal Deputy, Dominique Vian as Deputy for Interim Civil Administration, Dennis McNamara as Deputy: Humanitarian Affairs, Daan Everts as Deputy: Institution Building and Joly Dixon as Deputy: Reconstruction.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the UK contribution to the civil police in Kosovo. [90132]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United Nations have requested 60 UK police officers for Kosovo. We have offered to provide these officers to recruit, to train and to monitor a civil police force for Kosovo. We are currently discussing with the United Nations and the OSCE what specific roles these officers might undertake.

The united Kingdom has already deployed 16 Scene of Crime experts to Kosovo to assist the International War Crimes Tribunal with their investigation of alleged atrocities there.

Kashmir

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of Kashmir. [90140]

Mr. Hoon: We are deeply concerned by the continuing fighting in Jammu and Kashmir, following armed infiltration across the Line of Control. We welcomed the joint statement issued by President Clinton and Prime Minister Sharif on 4 July and look forward to the early implementation of the actions proposed. We consider the dialogue initiated by Prime Ministers Vajpayee and Sharif in Lahore in February offers the best hope of resolving the long standing differences between Pakistan and India and urge its resumption.

Hong Kong

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the independence of the judiciary in Hong Kong. [90135]

Mr. Hoon: We have the highest regard for the integrity of Hong Kong's legal institutions, particularly the Court of Final Appeal. The principles of independent judicial power and final adjudication, which are enshrined in the Joint Declaration, are integral to Hong Kong's high degree of autonomy.

Korea

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the future stability of the Korean peninsula. [90138]

Mr. Hoon: Prospects for stability depend on North Korean readiness to work with the international community to overcome contentious issues. We continue to support South Korea's policy of engagement as a way of encouraging North Korean co-operation.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of North Korea concerning routine international inspection of nuclear sites. [90139]

Mr. Hoon: The UK is concerned that the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is not receiving full co-operation from North Korea. We frequently make clear our views to North Korea, most recently in statements together with our EU partners at the June IAEA Board of Governors and the May Preparatory Committee for the 2000 Review Conference of the Non-Proliferation Treaty. We will continue to do so.

British EU Citizens

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the steps his Department is taking to ensure the free movement of British EU citizens within the states of the EU. [90133]

Ms Quin: Free Movement rights for EU citizens are enshrined within the Treaties. The Government attach importance to ensuring that these rights are upheld.

Chile

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he will take to improve the UK's relations with Chile. [90144]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had an open and cordial meeting with the new Chilean Foreign Minister, Sr. Valdes, in Rio on 27 June. My right hon. Friend emphasised the need for our two governments to work together to steer our relationship through this difficult period without serious damage. Both agreed to keep open the lines of communication between them.

Centre for European Reform

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contact (a) he and (b) his officials had with the Centre for European Reform, in relation to its lecture programme, during June. [90119]

Ms Quin: Ministers and officials have regular contact with a wide range of non-governmental organisations, including the Centre for European Reform. The Government believe that contact with this type of organisation is an important part of running a modern, inclusive government. The Government keep no official log of contact with such groups.

European Union Activities

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total number of (i) Commission decisions, (ii) directives, (iii) Council directives, (iv) Working Group proposals and (v) Committee opinions, agreed in 1998. [89726]

Ms Quin: According to the Commission's "General Report on the Activities of the European Union 1998", in 1998 there were 537 Commission Decisions, 44 Commission Directives, 27 Council Directives and 26 Council/European Parliament Directives. These figures exclude instruments not published in the official Journal and routine management instruments valid for a limited period.

Working groups do not make proposals for legislation. They carry out preparatory work for legislative decisions taken by the Council. There is no central record of the Opinions given by comitology committees. However, all legislation enacted following consideration by comitology committees is published in the Official Journal, copies of which are placed in the Library of the House.

European Commission Staff

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 21 June 1999, Official Report, column 276, concerning secondary employment of senior European Commission Staff; if he will request the information sought from the European Commission; and what his policy is on secondary employment of European Commission staff. [89807]

Ms Quin: For reasons of personal confidentiality, the Commission does not publish information about the secondary employment of officials below the level of Commissioner. As my answer of 21 June made clear, it does, however, have a system in place designed to prevent officials taking outside work which could impair their independence or be detrimental to the work of the Communities. The Government agree that any such secondary employment should be forbidden.

CABINET OFFICE

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the European Communities working groups which met over the last 12 months with a representative from his Department in attendance; if he will list the number of times each met; if he will indicate the nature of the Government's representation; and if he will make a statement. [88477]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Officials from my Department occasionally attend meetings of Council working groups. Sometimes my Department is represented by officials from the United Kingdom's Permanent Representation to the European Union. I have listed the working groups with which my Department is most closely involved, and the number of times these have met in the last 12 months with a representative from my Department in attendance.

Horizontal Questions Working Group: 5

Telecommunications Council Working Group: 7

General Affairs Working Group: 1

Quality of Legislation Working Group: 4.

Public Appointments

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the (a) numbers of and (b) ratio between men and women in public appointments made since 1997. [90181]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Appointments made to non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) are the responsibility of individual Ministers and their departments. However, the Commissioner for Public Appointments collects statistics on appointments to NDPBs within her remit on an annual basis. The Commissioner's fourth report, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House, contains information on appointments made during the year ending 31 March 1999.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90156]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out performance against departmental targets for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year. More detailed information about the percentage of correspondence replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91057]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: For the period between May 1997 to 31 March 1999, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 339.

Owing to the Easter recess there were only three sitting days between the period 1 April—14 April 1999. During that period there have been four named day parliamentary questions tabled to my Department of which 75 per cent. received a substantive reply on the day specified.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Compensation

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify the matters, other than those relating to the NIRS2 computer system, in respect of which his Department has paid compensation to members of the public since May 1997. [90540]

Mr. Timms: The reasons for which compensation payments have been made to members of the public, other than those relating to the NIRS2 computer system, since May 1997, are as follows:

Extra-statutory payments: made in respect of defective legislation where the law has not reflected the original intention of Ministers.

In addition, payments have been made as a result of Departmental maladministration where any of the following have occurred:

Actual financial loss: made in respect of losses incurred by customers as a direct result of maladministration;

Delay: made for the loss of use of money arising where payments have been unreasonably delayed (payment made has been in the form of interest on the arrears due);

Gross inconvenience: as a result of persistent Departmental error;

Gross embarrassment, humiliation or unnecessary personal intrusion;

Severe distress, where maladministration has had a serious impact on a customer's physical or mental health; and

Loss of statutory entitlement: where entitlement to benefit has been lost due to maladministration or official error.

Where maladministration occurs the Department aims to restore the person to the position that he or she would have been in but for that maladministration. Payments have been made by DSS agencies as a result of maladministration under all the categories listed.

Payments made from 1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999 by Agency are as follows:

Type of payment	Number of payments
Benefits Agency
Extra-Statutory	1,333
Actual Financial Loss	3,836

[1] Consolatory payments consist of payments made under the categories of gross inconvenience, gross embarrassment, humiliation, unnecessary personal intrusion and severe distress.

A copy of the Department's guide to special payments, known as the "Financial Redress for Maladministration" is held in the House of Commons Library.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90151]

Mr. Darling: Figures are not available in the format requested. In the 12 months ending June 1999, Ministers replied to 47 per cent. of letters from right hon. and hon. Members within our target of 20 working days, 37 per cent. within 21 to 40 working days; and 16 per cent. were sent after 40 working days. So far this year, Ministers have answered 60 per cent. of letters within 20 working days. Ministers in my Department reply to around 18,000 letters a year and we are committed fully to improving turnaround times.

Income Support

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of increasing the earnings disregard on income support to (a) £20 and (b) £25 per week. [90753]

Mr. Timms: The cost of an earnings disregard for all benefit units on Income Support (IS) of the requested levels is shown in the table:

Earnings disregard for IS benefit units	Cost (£ million)
£20	20

Notes:
1. Estimates based on February 1999 Income Support Statistics Quarterly Enquiry and the Policy Simulation Model.
2. Estimates exclude movements between Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and IS, and behavioural effects.
3. Estimates assume no change to the earnings disregards in Housing Benefit (HB) and Council Tax Benefit (CTB).
4. Estimates are rounded to the nearest £5m.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) of 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 802, how many of the 522 responses the consultation document, "Supporting People", (a) supported, (b) opposed and (c) did not mention, the inclusion of sheltered housing within the proposals; and if he will publish a summary of the responses. [90391]

Angela Eagle: Information is not available in the format requested. Of the 522 responses received, 128 referred to the position of sheltered housing. We hope to be in a position to publish the summary of responses shortly.

Pensions

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to receive the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority's third annual report; and if he will make a statement. [91149]

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received the third report of the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority (OPRA). I am pleased to see that OPRA has now consolidated its position as a respected and effective regulator. I am delighted that it continues to work closely with other organisations in the pensions industry to help, and protect the interests of, members of occupational pension schemes. Copies of the report have been laid before both Houses today.

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the next stage of formal consultation on stakeholder pensions policy will commence. [91150]

Mr. Timms: The consultation paper "Stakeholder Pensions: Clearing Arrangements—The Government Proposals" is published today. This is the third in a series of consultation papers on stakeholder pensions and further consultation papers will be issued in the coming weeks.

Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Library and are available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate (a) the cost and (b) the effect on the distribution of pensioners aged over 80 years by each income quintile for the population as a whole, of raising the level of basic state pension by (i) £5, (ii) £10 and (iii) £15 per week for this age group. [90249]

Mr. Timms: The answer to part (a) is provided in the table. Reliable estimates, of the effects of such changes on the distribution of pensioners aged over 80 years by each income quintile of the population as a whole, are not available.

Cost of increasing basic state pension paid to pensioners aged over 80

£5	350
£10	720
£15	1,130

Notes:
1. Estimates for Retirement Pension have been provided by the Government Actuary's Department.
2. Means-tested benefit offsets have been estimated using the 1999–2000 Income Support Simulation Model and the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey.
3. Estimates are consistent with the Departmental Report, are in current prices and benefit rates, and are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

Income Maintenance

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the average weekly Government expenditure on income maintenance per head of population in the United Kingdom. [90118]

Angela Eagle: For 1998–99, the total amount of Income Related Benefits paid in GB was £31.5 billion. This equates to an average of £10.50 per week per head of the population.

Notes:
1. Income maintenance is taken to mean the main Income Related Benefits (Income Support, Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit, JSA (income-based), Family Credit and Disability Working Allowance).
2. Figures are for GB. Figures in Northern Ireland are available separately from the Northern Ireland office.
3. The weekly figure given is rounded to the nearest 50 pence.

Data Matching

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what instructions and guidance he has given to staff to forbid them from approaching employers requiring copies of complete databases of personal data; and if he will place a copy of such guidance in the Library. [89593]

Mr. Timms: Fraud investigators have the power to request information from employers about their employees under Section 110 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 and the Jobseeker's Act 1995. Guidance on how to operate these powers is contained in a number of Departmental sources. These set out the Department's procedures for deterring and investigating fraud and it would not normally be appropriate to make them public.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the total number of claimant matches undertaken by his Department's data matching programme, (b) the number of matches which resulted in no further action, (c) the number of matches which required investigation by staff, (d) the number of matches which, following such investigation, resulted in no further action, (e) the number of withdrawn claims and prosecutions identified by data matching, (f) the cost of the data matching programme so far, including all direct and indirect staff costs and (h) the amounts of benefits saved by the data matching programme. [89591]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

This Department operates two data matching services: the Generalised Matching Service, which matches different DSS computer systems against each other and against data acquired from other Government Departments to identify anomalies for investigation; and the Housing Benefit Matching Service which matches data from Local Authority (LA) Housing and Council Tax benefit administration systems against data held by the DSS and other LAs to identify anomalies for the LAs to investigate.

[2] The Department only records details of the referrals to Local Authorities which result in benefit savings or identified overpayments.
[3] The figures given only relate to the costs of operating the Housing Benefit Matching Service. They do not include the Local Authorities' cost of investigating those referrals, which are not recorded by the DSS. This is a voluntary scheme and responsibility for recording the cost of participation would fall to the Local Authorities.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Youth Crime

16. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on tackling criminal activity by young people. [89226]

Mr. Boateng: Following the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, we are piloting in 10 areas the final warning scheme, a range of new community-based court disposals and Youth Offending Teams. We expect to implement these nationally next year. Under this Session's Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill we are proposing referrals to youth offender panels. The youth justice system is also being speeded up, and we have established the Youth Justice Board to provide advice and promote and monitor local good performance.

Air Guns

17. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward legislation to control the use of air guns. [89227]

Mr. Boateng: We have no immediate plans to change the law relating to air weapons but firearms legislation will be kept under close scrutiny to see if there is anything further which needs to be done to protect public safety. To this end, I have asked the Firearms Consultative Committee, the independent statutory body that advises the Government on firearms matters, to consider again the controls on air weapons as part of their programme of work for this year. I look forward to receiving their report later in the year and considering any recommendations they may make about airguns.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

20. Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's progress towards implementing the recommendations of the Macpherson report. [89230]

Mr. Straw: On 23 March I published an Action Plan which sets out how the report's recommendations will be taken forward. Progress has been made on implementing the recommendations in line with the published plan. The Steering Group, which I chair, which has responsibility for overseeing implementation of the report, met for the first time on 18 May. It next meets on 27 July.

Cricket World Cup

21. Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the measures taken to maintain public order for the cricket world cup. [89231]

Kate Hoey: It is a matter for the cricketing authorities and the police to assess the impact of security measures taken during the tournament. The Association of Chief Police Officers are presently compiling a report to see what lessons can be learned from the policing arrangements during the tournament. The tournament attracted almost 498,000 spectators and ACPO advise that there were 52 arrests and 323 ejections by stewards from grounds. These figures show that the vast majority of people attended matches for all the right reasons and were able to watch the cricket in a safe and secure environment.

Kosovar Refugees

22. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the number of Kosovan refugees settled into temporary accommodation in Birmingham; and how many have moved from their original locations to London and the south-east. [89232]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Four thousand, three hundred and forty-six evacuees have been airlifted to the United Kingdom under the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Humanitarian Evacuation Programme (HEP) from Macedonia. Most have been housed in reception centres in the Midlands, the North of England and Scotland; no reception centres have been established in Birmingham.

The latest estimates indicate that 572 of the refugees arriving under the HEP have moved from reception centres to London and the South East. A further 115 refugees did not enter reception centres and are thought to have moved to the South East.

34. Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the settling of Kosovan refugees into temporary accommodation across the country; and how many have moved from their original locations into London and the south-east. [89245]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Four thousand, three hundred and forty-six evacuees have been airlifted to the United Kingdom under the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Humanitarian Evacuation Programme (HEP) from Macedonia. Most have been housed in reception centres in the Midlands, the North of England and Scotland.

At the reception centres each refugee is given a health check and assigned a GP; children of school age are assigned to a local school; and refugees are put in touch with any known relatives and friends. Reception services for the refugees have been organised by the Local Authorities and the Refugee Council. Airport authorities, the immigration service and local medical services have also been heavily involved.

The refugees are free to move within the United Kingdom as they choose and it is inevitable that some refugees will go to areas where they have family or where other Kosovans have already settled, including London and the South East. The latest estimates indicate that 572 of the refugees arriving under the HEP have moved from reception centres to London and the South East. A further 115 refugees did not enter reception centres and are thought to have moved to the South East. 179 refugees have moved out of reception centres to other areas.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 July 1999, Official Report, column 310, how many of the refugees who arrived under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme and are not currently resident in reception centres are currently residing at addresses notified to his Department. [90635]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There is no requirement for refugees arriving under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme to inform the Home Office of their address, and none have done so.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Kosovar refugees have been evacuated to the UK since 1 June; and on what dates they arrived in the UK. [90638]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The numbers of arrivals of refugees from Kosovo since 1 June are given in the table:

Date	Airport of arrival	Number of refugees (Immigration Service statistics)
1 June 1999	Manchester	82
2 June 1999	Manchester	142
3 June 1999	Manchester	138
4 June 1999	Manchester	160
5 June 1999	Manchester	163
7 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	171
8 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	167
9 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	165
10 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	164
11 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	149
12 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	158
14 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	157
15 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	143
18 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	135
23 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	136
25 June 1999	Leeds/Bradford	102
2 July 1999	Glasgow	34

Medical flight
Nine medical patients

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 July 1999, Official Report, column 310, how many of the evacuees received from Kosovo into the UK have applied for asylum in the UK. [90637]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I regret that the information requested is not available as it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the first of the refugees who arrived in the UK under the UNHCR Humanitarian Evacuation Programme will return to Kosovo. [90636]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is our aim that refugees should return home as soon as possible and we are planning to start return flights from 19 July.

Severe Personality Disorders

23. Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Health on people with severe personality disorders; and if he will make a statement. [89233]

Mr. Straw: My statement to the House on 15 February 1999, Official Report, columns 601–03, set out our proposals to introduce powers of indeterminate detention for dangerously severely personality disorder individuals. The development of this policy has required joint working at all levels between the Home Office and the Department of Health—including extensive discussions between my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and myself.

I am pleased to announce, on behalf of both myself and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, that we will publish the consultation paper on the management of dangerous severely personality disordered individuals on 19 July.

Police Constables

24. Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police constables were employed in England at the latest date for which figures are available. [89235]

Mr. Boateng: Figures show that there were 91,047 constables in the 39 police forces in England as at 31 March 1999.

Millennium Compliance

25. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress on the millennium compliance of the date-related computer systems for which his Department is responsible. [89236]

Mr. Straw: All business critical computer systems in the Home Department are expected to be Millennium compliant by September 1999. 83 per cent. of these systems are now compliant, with 95 per cent. due to be compliant by the end of this month. 71 per cent. of non-critical computer systems are now compliant, with the remaining systems due to be compliant by November.

Prison Service, United Kingdom Passport Agency and Forensic Science Service critical computer systems will be compliant by the end of this month, with non-critical systems compliant by August. All Fire Service College computer systems will be compliant by September.

Anti-social Behaviour Orders

26. Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the use to date of anti-social behaviour orders. [89237]

32. Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the use to date of anti-social behaviour orders. [89243]

Mr. Boateng: We understand that, to date, there has been at least one order granted and that a number of others are in the pipeline. The provisions relating to anti social behaviour orders only came into effect on 1 April 1999. It is, therefore, still early days to know what use local crime and disorder partnerships will make of them.

Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in implementing the Anti-social Behaviour Orders under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. [89241]

Mr. Boateng: The provisions in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 which introduce Anti-Social Behaviour Orders (ASBO) came into effect on 1 April 1999. It is, therefore, still early days to know what use local crime and disorder partnerships will make of them. The decision as to whether an ASBO should be granted, however, is a matter for the courts. We understand that, to date, there has been at least one order granted and that a number of others are in the pipeline.

Passports

27. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what method he plans to calculate compensation payments to citizens missing overseas trips due to difficulties at the UK Passport Agency. [89238]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Compensation is calculated to restore the claimant to the financial position they would have enjoyed had an acceptable level of service in processing their passports been provided. Each case is considered carefully on its merits and a claimant will be asked to provide documentary evidence of the cost of their loss of an overseas trip and confirm they have made no other claim for compensation.

33. Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress with measures to reduce delays at the Passport Agency. [89244]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Passport Agency is continuing to prioritise applications by travel dates, and is meeting those dates in 99.99 per cent. of cases. In order to improve on this it is recruiting an additional 100 staff above the 300 already deployed. The Agency is working extended hours and straightforward renewal applications are being exceptionally extended by passport offices, and from 7 July at main Post Offices. These measures have boosted output by 24 per cent. over last year.

Adverts were placed in the national and regional media on 2 July advising the general public awaiting or applying for a passport what to do. A special telephone helpline has been set up for inquiries.

The Agency's intake is now falling, and this together with the measures it is taking should enable it to reduce current delays, and get its turnround time down to 10 days by the end of September.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations the Passport Agency made to his Department on the impact of (a) the changes relating to the issuing of passports for children and (b) the introduction of new information technology systems on (i) staffing and (ii) resource levels; and if he will make a statement. [90946]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The impact of separate passports for children and the new Information Technology system were built into the Passport Agency's planning assumptions which underpinned its 1998–99 Business Plan and 1998–2001 Corporate Plan.

As indicated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the debate on Passport Delays on 29 June 1999, Official Report, columns 140–96, we were aware in late-March that the Agency's turnround times and arrears were higher than expected. An action plan was agreed including the recruitment of 300 extra staff and other measures which the Agency's management believed would deal with the problems.

The surge in intake from April led to a further deterioration, and further measures have been taken to reduce processing delays.

The Agency has continued to meet more than 99.99 per cent. of travel dates, and expects to continue to do so. The Agency very much regrets the difficulties that have arisen this year. It aims to reduce its turnround time for clearing straightforward applications to ten days by the end of September.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest situation on delays in issuing passports by the Passport Agency. [89249]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As of yesterday, the number of applications waiting to be processed was just under 500,000, a reduction of 6 per cent. on the previous week's figure. This figure is equivalent to just under four weeks output.

However more than half of these applications are for people indicating travel dates for August, September and beyond. The Passport Agency is prioritising work according to travel dates, and in the vast majority of cases—99.99 per cent.—applicants are receiving their passports in time to travel. It is taking steps to improve on this. The Agency have employed 300 additional staff, and are recruiting a further 100. It is working extended hours, streamlining its processes and using exceptional extensions to renew passports both at Passport Offices and main Post Offices. The Agency's intake is now falling, and this together with the special measures it is taking will reduce delays and enable it to hit its target of processing all properly completed applications by the end of September.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 28 June 1999, Official Report, columns 77–78, how many passport applications have been endorsed with a two-year extension in each week from the week beginning 31 May to the last week for which information is available; and how many of those renewals were of passports which included the names of children aged under 16 years. [90560]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The table shows the number of extensions that have been made in the weeks requested:

Week commencing	Number of extensions
31 May 1999	5,585
7 June 1999	5,141
14 June 1999	4,553
21 June 1999	4,098
28 June 1999	4,530
Total	23,907

Separate records are not kept of extensions made where children are included on a passport.

Victims of Crime

28. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that the police give more information to victims of crime about action being taken. [89239]

Mr. Boateng: Interim findings from pilot projects established to see how the Victim's Charter commitment to keep victims informed might best be met were promulgated in Home Office Circular 55/1998 of 23 December 1998. Following final evaluation, we hope to issue good practice guidelines to the police, and other agencies, later this year.

Drug Abuse (Prisons)

29. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the level of drug abuse in prisons. [89240]

Mr. George Howarth: The result of random mandatory drug testing (MDT) provide the best information available on the level of drug misuse in prison. In 1998–99, 18.3 per cent. of random MDT samples were positive for drugs; well within the KPI target of 20 per cent. for that year.

Cycling Offences

31. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to give police the powers to levy spot fines on cyclists. [89242]

Mr. Boateng: The police already have powers to issue fixed penalty notices for a number of cycling offences. We propose to introduce a further one for cycling on the pavement from 1 August. The fixed penalty is not an on the spot fine, payment will not be required on the spot and the person receiving it can challenge its issue in court.

Crime Rates

35. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the changes in crime rates since 2 May 1997. [89246]

Mr. Straw: The most recent data available are for the 12 months to 31 March 1998. These show an overall decrease of 8 per cent. in notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in comparison to the previous year.

MI5

36. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the role, status and functioning of F Branch of the Security Service since the publication of the Home Office's 1998 booklet about MI5. [89247]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to his question on 30 June 1999, Official Report, column 186. The 1998 booklet "MI5 The Security Service" contains a great deal of information about the work of the Service and provides as much information as it is possible to disclose on the subject of interest to the hon. Member.

Prison Population

37. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the numbers of (a) young and (b) other offenders in prison (i) currently and (ii) on 1 May 1997. [89248]

Mr. George Howarth: The available information is given in the table.

Population in prisons in England and Wales on 30 April 1997 and 30 April 1999 by type of custody

Date	Young offenders[1]	Others[2]	Total
30 April 1997	10,597	49,534	60,131
30 April 1999	11,334	53,062	64,396

[1] Persons aged under 21 years
[2] Persons aged 21 years and over

Data Protection

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he is making towards implementing the Data Protection Act 1998. [91227]

Mr. George Howarth: The work on the essential subordinate legislation is well advanced, but it will not be completed before the summer recess. We intend to lay the instruments before Parliament in the autumn. To allow business and others adequate time to prepare, we intend to bring the 1998 Act into force on 1 March 2000. Meanwhile, drafts of three further statutory instruments will be published on the Internet at www.homeoffice.gov.uk on 13 July 1999. I am also placing copies in the Library.

Prison Service

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures are taken to ensure that risk assessments in the Prison Service conform to a uniform approach. [90116]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service undertakes risk assessments for a variety of purposes. These need to be based on consistent principles, but responsive to the complexities of individual situations. Arrangements are supported by detailed guidance, defined procedures and standards audit. Prisoners dissatisfied with decisions can make use of the request and complaints procedures.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are in place to ensure parity of treatment in respect of entitlement to home leave across the Prison Service. [90113]

Mr. George Howarth: There is no entitlement to resettlement licence, which replaced home leave in 1995. The criteria for eligibility for resettlement licence is set out in Prison Service Instruction 36/1995, a copy of which is in the Library. The Instruction is mandatory which ensures consistency of treatment in respect of eligibility for resettlement licence.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are in place to monitor the consistency of approach in the use by governors in the Prison Service of their discretionary powers. [90115]

Mr. George Howarth: Eligibility for temporary release does not pre-suppose it will be granted by the governor. Applications from eligible prisoners are considered on a case by case basis and subject to a risk assessment. Governors use their discretion in the light of the risk assessment and reasonableness under the Wednesbury Principle. These decisions are subject to judicial review.

Women Prisoner (Breastfeeding)

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the past year a woman prisoner has been told that she had to stop breastfeeding in order to attend educational or other courses inside a prison. [89344]

Mr. George Howarth: There are no occasions in the past year when a woman prisoner has been told to stop breastfeeding in order to attend educational or other courses inside a prison. The Prison Service supports the good practice of women breastfeeding their babies. A woman prisoner can express milk and leave the milk with nursery nurses to feed her baby or she can leave the class to breastfeed her baby and rejoin when she has finished. The choice is left to the breastfeeding mother.

The four mother and baby units in the female prison estate actively encourage breastfeeding and pregnant women have access to information and professional advice to enable them to make an informed choice about how to feed their babies.

Drive for Youth

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met and when he next expects to meet representatives of Drive for Youth. [90301]

Mr. Straw: I met the Chairman of Drive for Youth briefly on Monday 5 July. I have no current plans to meet with representatives in the near future, but I have asked them to let me have written representation about their concerns which I shall consider.

Mr. Jay Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet a representative group on behalf of Mr. Jay Abatan's family to discuss the actions of the police and the prosecution process following his death after an attack in Brighton. [90747]

Mr. Straw: As criminal proceedings are still outstanding in respect of two defendants, it would be inappropriate for me to discuss this case.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90161]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Tax Discs

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals in Merseyside have been recorded as failing to display a current tax disc in each of the preceding 12 months; how many have been fined; and what fines have been levied. [90695]

Mr. Boateng: The available information held centrally relates to prosecutions in Merseyside in 1997 for offences of failing to pay the appropriate motor vehicle licence duty and for having the licence disc obscured or not affixed, the number of fines imposed and the average fine amount.

Prosecutions for failing to pay motor vehicle licence duty, Merseyside, 1997

Total 1997	2,033	1,683	105	196	45	35

In addition to the fine, it is normal for the court to order back-payment of duty and costs.

There may be additional offences dealt with by means of fixed penalty notices and written warnings but in neither case are figures by individual offence or month held centrally. Figures for 1998 are not yet available.

Operation CARE

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have been (a) charged and (b) arrested in connection with operation CARE (Merseyside); and how many individuals to date have claimed to have been abused and over what period of time. [90696]

Mr. Boateng: Operation CARE, which commenced in April 1996, is a joint investigation between Merseyside Police and Social Services Departments into mostly historical allegations of sexual and physical abuse upon children in care establishments and voluntary care settings.

The table gives an overview of the current situation:

Period under investigation	1960-date
Persons arrested	66
Persons convicted	20
Persons acquitted after trial	2
Persons arrested and no further action	5
Persons charged and awaiting trial	14
Persons on police bail	25
Separate complaints received	759
Offenders/suspects	358

Police Authorities

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the report into the sparsity element of the funding formula for police authorities. [90631]

Mr. Boateng: The external research project commissioned by the Home Office examined whether there are any additional costs associated with the policing of sparsely populated rural areas. The final report from the researchers was considered by a Home Office-led Working Group, which includes representatives of the police, police authorities and local authorities, on 8 July. The Home Secretary and I will be considering the report shortly, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Children's Passports

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his reasons were for deciding that summaries of court orders should not be endorsed on children's passports. [90516]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Where children hold passports, a court can require the surrender of a passport and so the endorsement of a court order may not be necessary.

However, there has not been a decision that summaries of court orders should not be endorsed on children's passports. This issue has been considered by the Parent/Carer Child Abduction Co-ordinating Group, which is an inter-departmental group of officials, together with Re-unite. The Group will be looking at the effectiveness of introducing endorsements of the passports of children at risk of abduction.

Mrs. Sabina Morison

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it is expected that a decision will be reached on the application of Mrs. Sabina Mbiri Morison (Home Office reference M636323) to have the deportation order on her lifted. [90840]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The papers relating to Mrs. Morison's case are not immediately available and I regret that it is accordingly not possible to give an indication of the likely timescale involved. I will write to the hon. Member.

Prisoner Repatriation (Ireland)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for prisoner repatriation to the Republic of Ireland are under consideration; and how many of these are from prisoners convicted of terrorist offences. [89905]

Mr. George Howarth: 48 applications for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland are currently under consideration, including three from prisoners convicted of Irish terrorist related offences.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what, in each year since 1997, was the average length of time taken for a prison transfer from the submission of a successful application to their arrival in the Republic of Ireland for (a) IRA prisoners and (b) non-IRA prisoners. [89906]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested is given in the table.

Average periods [1], from date of submission of a successful application for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland to date of arrival in the Republic, in 1997 and 1998

	Prisoners convicted of terrorist related offences [2]	Non-terrorist prisoners
1997	Approximately 9 months	Approximately 23 months
1998	Approximately 10 months	All applications submitted in 1998 remain outstanding

[1] Not all applications were resolved in the same calendar year as that in which they were submitted

[2] Details of prisoners' alleged paramilitary affiliations are not centrally recorded

Local Inmates Database System

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the principal functions of the Local Inmates Database System; how many records the system contains; under what fields information is recorded about inmates; what would be the cost of adding an extra field to this system; how many fields would be required to monitor the ethnic composition of the prison population along the lines of the proposed questions for Census 2001; and what arrangements are in place to link information on inmates detained elsewhere in the United Kingdom. [89907]

Mr. George Howarth: The Local Inmates Database System (LIDS) operates at each public prison to support the administration of prisoners' sentences. It covers a wide range of administrative functions including the recording of all movements of prisoners including: reception, transfers to and from courts, adjudications while in prisons; details of prisoners earnings and private cash; related work and activities; and all forms of release. It holds a broad set of information needed to support these processes, much of which is transferred to a separate central system which supports overall management and monitoring of the Prison Service. LIDS records are transferred automatically between prisons in England and Wales when prisoners move location.

The individual prison LIDS systems hold full details of all current prisoners and those who have recently been released. The total number of records held, therefore, varies according to the size of the overall prison population but is generally some 20,000 to 30,000 above this.

In addition to standard fields such as name, date of birth, place of birth, the system holds several hundred fields supporting the functionality described. The cost of adding an additional field to the system is heavily dependent on the extent to which the change can be combined with other activity, whether it warrants significant staff training or needs complex programming.

LIDS already has fields which hold details of ethnic origin, country of birth and place of birth. The coding system used for these fields is not identical to that proposed for the Census in 2001 but could be adapted for that purpose.

There are no arrangements in place to link LIDS data with similar systems maintained by other jurisdictions.

Learmont Inquiry

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish his response to the Learmont Inquiry. [89908]

Mr. George Howarth: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Ms Ryan) on 26 January 1999, Official Report, columns 201–02.

Special Secure Units

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are detained in each special secure unit; and if he will list for each (a) the nature of crime for which the prisoner was convicted, (b) the (i) national origin and (ii) citizenship of the prisoner, (c) their special category status, (d) their length of detention in the unit and (e) how many medical examinations have been conducted in that time; and what supervisory mechanism is in place to ensure that any abnormal medical observations are acted upon. [89909]

Mr. George Howarth: On 5 July 1999, seven prisoners were held in special secure units (SSUs), five at Whitemoor and two at Belmarsh. Only prisoners categorised as category A exceptional escape risk are held in SSUs.

The table gives the information requested including the number of three monthly medical reviews conducted. These reviews are part of the operating standards for SSUs and are provided in addition to the normal health care facilities available to every prisoner. Any prisoner who is observed to be presenting abnormal medical conditions will be discussed by the senior medical officer and the unit governor. The senior medical officer will provide or recommend medical services as appropriate according to his judgment.

Nationality	Offence	Time spent in SSU	Number of three-monthly health reviews
Turkish	Importation and supply of drugs	4 months	2
British	Murder	2 months	1
British	Conspiracy to supply drugs	1 month	0
British	Armed robbery	2 months	0
American	Conspiracy to murder	3 years	7
Colombian	Customs evasion	2 years	6
Turkish	Conspiracy to supply drugs	7 months	2

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to address deficiencies in the completion of visitor records for the special secure unit at Whitemoor Prison; and on what dates between 1 September 1998 and 1 April 1999 the Governor of Whitemoor Prison visited its special secure unit. [89910]

Mr. George Howarth: The operating standards for the special secure unit at Whitemoor include a requirement for weekly visits by the governing governor or, in his absence, a nominated representative. These visits are recorded. This is in response to recommendation 44 of the Woodcock report that frequent supervisory visits should be carried out and recorded in a matrix to be produced monthly to the prison governor. The table provides the specific information requested.

Firearms

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to pay interest on the compensation paid to gunholders who have handled firearms under the Firearms (Amendment) Acts. [90541]

Mr. Boateng: There is no provision to include interest as part of the payments made under the terms of the statutory firearms compensation scheme. Compensation claims made under this scheme are not commercial debts requiring payment within the standard 30 days.

Jury Trial

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what evidence he based his statement to the Police Federation on 19 May concerning the proportion of either-way cases in the previous year in which defendants chose to be heard before a jury and the plea was changed to a guilty one. [90754]

Mr. Boateng: Crown Prosecution Service statistics for 1998 show that 18,500 defendants elected trial in 1998 in addition to 46,800 either-way cases directed to the Crown Court by magistrates. During the same period 74 per cent. of all defendants pleaded guilty before the commencement of the Crown Court trial.

VAT

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the list of questions put to the VAT authorities of the other member states and the Commission on the interpretation of Article 13.B(d)(1) to (6) of the Sixth Directive and the responses received. [88921]

Dawn Primarolo: Member states and the Commission were asked a number of questions designed to ascertain the meaning of the Directive term "negotiation" by reference: to the equivalent terms used in each Community language and the national laws of Member states; to any litigation in national courts; and to a number of case studies drawn from the UK courts.

This consultation was undertaken on an inter-governmental confidential basis, and publication of member states' responses would breach the confidence of the authorities consulted.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to paragraph 10 (Other Comments) of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise Summary of Responses (May 1999) to the VAT: Consultation Document on European Commission Proposal for Revised Rules on Input Tax Deduction, how many contributors (a) questioned what exchange rate would be used if foreign invoice amounts had to be converted to sterling, (b) suggested that it would be beneficial if all accounting were in euros and (c) suggested that the periodic rates of exchange published by Customs and Excise should be used. [88917]

Dawn Primarolo: Six contributors questioned what exchange rate should be used if foreign invoice amounts had to be converted to sterling; three suggested that it would be beneficial if the accounting were in euros; and three suggested that the periodic rates of exchange published by Customs and Excise should be used.

Company Liquidations

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies were put into receivership or liquidation at the suit of (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96, (iii) 1996–97, (iv) 1997–98 and (v) 1998–99. [90294]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 8 July 1999]: The following figures show the number of company liquidations in England and Wales on Inland Revenue and

HM Customs and Excise petitions, and also show those numbers as a proportion of the total number of company liquidations. Receiverships usually result from actions by debenture holders, and neither the Inland Revenue nor Customs take such actions.

Year	Inland Revenue	Percentage of total liquidations	HM Customs and Excise	Percentage of total liquidations
1994–95	761	5	2,409	15
1995–96	646	4.5	2,121	15
1996–97	625	5	2,120	16

1998–99	519	4	1,399[1]	10

Bankruptcies

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals were made bankrupt at the suit of (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96, (iii) 1996–97, (iv) 1997–98 and (v) 1998–99. [90295]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 8 July 1999]: The figures in the following table show the number of individual bankruptcies in England and Wales on Inland Revenue and HM Customs and Excise petitions, and also show those numbers as a proportion of the total number of individual bankruptcies.

Year	Inland Revenue	Percentage of total bankruptcies	HM Customs and Excise	Percentage of total bankruptcies
1994–95	2,179	9	2,270	10
1995–96	2,217	10	2,524	11
1996–97	2,677	12.5	2,884	14

Savings Income (Overpaid Tax)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 229, concerning overpayment of tax on savings income, what discussions have taken place between his Department and the Department for Social Security concerning the Taxback campaign. [90453]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue are planning to have discussions with a number of organisations, including the Department of Social Security, during the summer about a possible Taxback campaign next year.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason the current applicants to the EU are not required (i) to adopt the euro immediately on accession or (ii) to join an exchange rate mechanism. [90756]

Ms Hewitt: The accession partnerships between the European Union and the accession countries state that the applicants are not expected to adopt the euro immediately on accession. The partnerships do however require the applicants to pursue policies aimed at achieving real convergence with the European Union, with the ultimate goal of adoption of the euro. The partnerships impose no obligation to join the exchange rate mechanism, which remains voluntary for all member states.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90163]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

More detailed information about the percentage of correspondence replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Overseas Tax Evasion

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has agreed, with the relevant professionals, guidance on the conduct by corporate clients which they should regard as evidence of overseas tax evasion in cases where they are obliged to report suspicion thereof to the NICS. [89921]

Ms Hewitt: The Joint Money Laundering Steering Group, a body of representatives from the financial services industry, chaired by the British Bankers Association, provides guidance to the financial sector on money laundering issues. They have recently consulted the Treasury and Home Office on new guidelines on the proceeds of tax-related crimes, including those committed overseas. Those guidelines have now been published, and are endorsed by the Treasury.

Under the Criminal Justice Act 1993, financial institutions should report to the National Criminal Intelligence Service all transactions which they suspect involve the proceeds of criminal conduct. This obligation is a central element of our defence against money laundering, and provides valuable intelligence in the fight against crime. The obligation applies equally to the proceeds of overseas offences (including overseas tax offences), where the conduct would have been criminal if it had occurred in the UK. "Evidence" is not required: the obligation applies where there is knowledge or suspicion that the relevant conduct has occurred or is occurring.

Climate Change Levy

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he will make to the letter addressed to him by the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution in relation to the compatibility of maintaining coal burn in electricity generation with the stated aim of the climate change levy. [88741]

Ms Hewitt: The climate change levy is expected to save around 1.5 million tonnes of carbon a year by 2010, thereby making a significant contribution to meeting both the legally binding target for reducing greenhouse emissions set under Kyoto Protocol, and the Government's domestic goal of a 20 per cent. cut in carbon dioxide emissions by 2020.

The final rates of the climate change levy will not be set until the Finance Bill 2000. It is proposed to set them on an "energy" basis with one rate applying to all electricity. This is entirely consistent with the Government's Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation, which identified distortions in the generation market as a potential threat to the security and diversity of energy supplies and announced a programme of reform to ensure fair competition between fuels.

It also reflects the fact that under current electricity trading arrangements it is only possible to determine the carbon content of electricity as a broad average with a downstream tax. Thus, the extent of switching between fuels is likely to be limited with a tax set to reflect the carbon content. Given that the carbon content of electricity is changing all the time, a tax structured on an energy basis also has the advantage of simplicity.

We are liaising closely with DTI colleagues on how electricity trading arrangements might change in the future. We have also consulted on the specific issue of whether it might be possible to offer tax relief to new forms of renewable sources of electricity like wind power. The consultation document issued by Customs and Excise on Budget day asked for views on whether—and if so, how—this could be done.

Savings (Marginal Tax Rates)

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effective marginal tax rates on income from savings for pensioners, and the number of pensioners at each level. [88808]

Dawn Primarolo: If all taxpaying pensioners received an extra £1 of (non-dividend) savings income, then 3.1 million of them would pay 20p more tax, 150,000 would pay 25p more tax, 200,000 would pay 30p more tax and 150,000 of them would pay 40p more tax.

These numbers are based on the 1996–97 Survey of Personal incomes projected to 1999–2000. Pensioners have been defined as women aged 60 and over and men aged 65 and over.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the number of cars which will attract the small engine size rate of vehicle excise duty announced in his last budget. [89300]

Ms Hewitt: Over 1.8 million cars are recorded by DVLA as eligible for the reduced rate of VED for cars of 1100cc or less. This represents approximately 8 per cent. of the total recorded by DVLA as licensed in the Private and Light Goods vehicle class.

Well-known manufacturers currently producing cars with engines up to 1100cc include Citroen, Daewoo, Daihatsu, Fiat, Hyundai, Seat, Suzuki, Vauxhall and Volkswagen.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from owners of cars under 1120 cc concerning the engine size level at which the lower rate of vehicle excise duty was set in his budget; and if he will make a statement. [89301]

Ms Hewitt: In his March Budget, the Chancellor detailed how changes to vehicle excise duty will encourage the use of more fuel efficient vehicles. He announced a cut in the vehicle excise duty rate for those cars with engines up to 1100cc and, that from Autumn 2000, a new system of graduated vehicle excise duty would be introduced for all new cars based upon the level of carbon emissions.

We have received representations from people whose vehicles are just over the threshold.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will refund the vehicle excise duty of new car owners whose engine capacity exceeds 1.1 litres by 0.05 litres. [89923]

Ms Hewitt: In his March Budget, the Chancellor announced a reduced vehicle excise duty rate of £100 for both new and existing cars with engines up to 1,100cc as recorded on the vehicle registration document.

Unfortunately it is inevitable that, however small the margin, some people will miss out at the boundaries of any threshold.

Banknotes

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons the new 20 pound note does not have a £ sign. [89264]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 1 July 1999]: The design of notes is a matter for the Bank of England.

The new £20 note features the numeral 20 in the top corners of both sides and the pound sign appears before three of those. The exception is before the numeral in the top right hand corner above the portrait of The Queen.

To assist the partially sighted (and tourists who may be unfamiliar with the note), all four numerals have been designed to be as large and as bold as possible in the limited space available; to maximise this visibility, the pound sign was omitted in one place. In addition the words "Twenty Pounds" appear on both sides of the note.

Financial Services Industry

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the terms of the Financial Services and Markets Bill require a reduction in the powers of the Office of Fair Trading in the monitoring of the financial services industry. [R] [89320]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 1 July 1999]: There is nothing in the Financial Services and Markets Bill which requires a reduction in the powers of the Office of Fair Trading to monitor the financial services industry. On the contrary, it will extend the powers which the Office has to scrutinise the regulatory activities of the Financial Services Authority.

Royal Mint

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the outcome is of the Treasury's review of the future status of the Royal Mint. [91238]

Ms Hewitt: On 8 July 1998, Official Report, column 569, the then Economic Secretary announced the terms of reference of a review of the Royal Mint. The review was wide ranging with the aim of identifying the actions needed to enable the Royal Mint to develop closer partnership with the private sector. The review was conducted by the Treasury working closely with the Royal Mint's management and taking the views of employees and other interested parties.

After weighing the options, the Government have decided in favour of a new direction for the Royal Mint, which will bring it up to date with best practice in the private sector. A package of measures will put the Royal Mint on a modern, commercial footing updating the way it is run, the business it does, and its relationship with the Treasury, private partners and customers.

This a bold step forward in the Government's approach to managing their agencies. The new framework will make the Treasury a better shareholder and the Royal Mint a better enterprise to the benefit of all stakeholders. It will ensure the Royal Mint makes the best possible use of the opportunities it faces, including the ability to offer an extended range of goods and services and to make fuller use of its expertise and its capacity.

The new framework contains a number of elements. First, more rigorous shareholder discipline, delivered through a new Treasury panel of top private sector analysts and managers. The panel will inject greater private sector expertise into the Treasury's oversight of the Royal Mint, as shareholder. The expertise of the panel will be used to improve and sharpen the incentives on the Royal Mint, with the aim of making its decision taking more transparent, and more commercial.

Building on this new relationship, we will better define the role of the non-executive directors of the Royal Mint, who, like the directors of private companies, will in future have a clear responsibility to enhance the prosperity of the business over time. We will also bring the number of executives and non-executives on the board into more even balance, in line with best-practice corporate governance.

Consistent with this process of modernisation, the Royal Mint's financial reporting will be more closely aligned with that of private companies, making it more easily understood by customers, potential partners and analysts.

These changes will complement a relaxation of the controls which currently restrict the Royal Mint's activities. At present it can only make coins and a narrow range of related products. In future it will be free to exploit its technical skills and assets by offering a wider range of products and by expanding into non-coinage business, where commercially viable. It will also be able to participate in a wider range of ventures with the private sector. With these new freedoms, the Royal Mint will be able to reach its full potential, on its own, or in partnership with private sector firms.

The updated model of corporate governance, and the private sector expertise it will inject, will help develop the Royal Mint as a business. It will also be vital in securing the best possible use of the new commercial freedoms that will be given to the Royal Mint. I believe the Royal Mint has the skills, the aptitudes and the opportunities to expand into wider markets on its own, and in partnership with commercial companies. In future it will be able to exploit them to the full.

These fundamental changes will put real business expertise at the heart of the management of the Royal Mint, and will help maximise its value as a business and its contribution to the UK economy, to the benefit of all stakeholders.

The Royal Mint has a successful track record. It has seen its business grow internationally, making it a world leader we can all be proud of. But the coinage business is increasingly competitive across the world, and we cannot stand still if we want to maintain its position at the forefront in the global marketplace. The package outlined above is an important first step in laying the foundations for the Royal Mint's future prosperity.

We envisage a process of continuing development and improvement of the Royal Mint, its strategic direction, and its operating framework. We will be looking on a continuing basis at how best to expand and improve the business, and to help it adapt and respond to the challenges ahead.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the European Communities working groups which met over the last 12 months with a representative from his Department in attendance; if he will list the number of times each met; if he will indicate the nature of the Government's representation; and if he will make a statement. [88483]

Mr. Rooker: Officials from my Department regularly attend working groups in Brussels. These working groups comprise: Council working groups; Commission working groups; and Committees involved in matters relating to agriculture and rural development, the majority of which are management committees for common market organisations.

Statistics are retained for a six monthly period. During the last six months, my Department was represented at some 350 working groups (by some 750 officials in total). A similar number of working groups would have taken place in the previous six months.

We attach a great deal of importance to UK representation at these groups, which both undertake technical work on EU legislation which will apply in the UK and handle the day-to-day management of markets.

EU Food and Veterinary Office

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if applicants for (a) professional posts in the European Union Food and Veterinary Office and

(b) public service posts with the UK Government or its agencies are permitted to canvas in support of their applications. [88299]

Mr. Rooker: The procedure for applications for professional posts in the European Union Food and Veterinary Office is a matter for the European Commission. In the UK, all appointments to posts in the Civil Service are legally subject to the Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment Code which is designed to ensure fair and open competition, selection on merit, and equal opportunities.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90150]

Mr. Nick Brown: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my right hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the targets set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Raw Milk Processing Plants

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many raw milk processing plants closed in the United Kingdom in the (a) 1970s, (b) 1980s and (c) 1990s. [90954]

Mr. Rooker: The 1994 edition of Dairy Facts and Figures, published by the Residuary Milk Marketing Board, indicates net reductions in establishments receiving ex-farm milk of 401 between 1970 and 1980; of 111 between 1980 and 1990; and of 61 between 1990 and 1994. Industry figures indicate a further reduction of 24 between 1994 and 1998.

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many meetings of the CJCC he has attended. [89274]

Mr. Nick Brown: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 5 July 1999, Official Report, columns 362–63.

Chocolate Directive

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the nature of Commission objections to the comitology provisions of the chocolate directive. [90397]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 7 July 1999, Official Report, column 552.

School Milk

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what powers the European Commission is seeking to end school milk subsidies in infant and junior schools in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [90183]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 July 1999]: The European Commission would have to submit a formal proposal to the EC Agriculture Council to amend the Council Regulation concerning the common organisation of the market in milk and milk products (Regulation 1255/99 from 1 January 2000). It has not yet done so.

BSE (USA)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what date his Department asked the United States Government to comment on the recent reports of the presence of BSE in the USA; to which United States departments these requests were addressed; and on what date the United States departments replied. [90402]

Mr. Rooker: On 10 May an official in my Department wrote to the Agricultural Economist at the US Embassy in London drawing attention to allegations in a letter published in Farmers Weekly that there were cases of BSE in the USA. A substantive reply was received by my Department on 17 June drawing on advice supplied to the Embassy by the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS).

PRIME MINISTER

Social Exclusion

Ms Drown: To ask the Prime Minister when he intends to publish the Social Exclusion Unit report on 16 to 18-year-olds not in education, employment or training; and if he will make a statement. [91008]

The Prime Minister: Last summer, I asked the Social Exclusion Unit to assess how many 16 to 18-year-olds are not in education, work or training, to analyse the reasons why and to produce proposals to reduce the number significantly. I am publishing the Unit's report today. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

At any one time, more than 160,000 16 to 18-year-olds—one in 11 of the age group—are not in education, training or work. The young people most likely not to participate in education, training or work during this period of their lives come from backgrounds of poverty or unemployment in the family, have truanted or been excluded from school, have been in care or live in the poorest neighbourhoods. There are clear links between non-participation and other problems encountered in adolescence. Half the young women who are outside education, work or training are teenage parents or carers, and there are links also with homelessness, offending and serious drug misuse.

Non-participation at this time in their lives has a dire effect on young people's future life prospects. By their mid-twenties, they are much more likely than their peers to have no qualifications, to be unemployed, to be poor, to experience poor health and depression and, if they are men, to have a criminal record which damages their prospects of work. The Government have a number of programmes in place to tackle educational under-achievement and youth disaffection, including the setting up of youth offending teams. But more needs to be done. The Unit's Report shows that there is little joined-up delivery of services to young people, and that the end of compulsory schooling at 16 is seen by too many young people as the end of education, rather than as a basis for its continuation. For too many of them, no one is responsible outside the family for guiding them through adolescence and there is not enough effective support to help them overcome personal problems that get in the way of learning. There are also strong arguments for giving more financial help to young people from poor families who want to stay on in education.

The Unit's Report plots a way forward in combating social exclusion among this age group. The Government believe that young people should be given every encouragement and support to stay in full-time education after they are 16 and reach at least a Level 2 qualification. It will ask the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority to consult on ways of giving young people who stay in education until 16 recognition for what they have achieved in education and elsewhere. It will build on improvements already in train in education and skills for 13 to 19-year-olds, with a particular emphasis on the education received by young people in custody.

To extend the financial support available to young people to stay in education, the pilots of the Education Maintenance Allowance will be extended to include homeless and disabled young people, and those with high transport costs, for example in rural areas.

The Report also provides more detail on the new Youth Support Service, which was announced in the White Paper "Learning to Succeed" (Cm 4392) on 30 June. The aim of the new service will be to provide for young people between the ages of 13 and 19 individually tailored guidance and support, in places and ways which meet their needs. The youth support service will be a new service operating in a radically different way. It will look at the broad range of needs which a young person may have, focusing on those who require most help with the clear goal of supporting participation in learning. It will link closely with other agencies in doing this.

It is clear that the best defence against social exclusion is having a job, and the best chance of having a job is to be well educated. This will be more the case in the information age of the future than it has ever been. The years between 16 and 18 are crucial ones; making the wrong decision at that stage can affect a young person's prospects for the rest of their life. This action plan for the whole of Government will help to put young people firmly on the right track.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Attorney-General what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90534]

The Attorney-General: The Treasury Solicitor's department holds, as a matter of course, information as to the age and gender of all its staff. In 1998, the department conducted fresh surveys of staff then in post, requesting information on ethnic origin and disability. The survey information is regularly updated as new entrants are invited to complete survey forms on joining. No new 'data series' (internal surveys) have been commissioned by my other departments (the Crown Prosecution Service and the Serious Fraud Office).

All my departments contribute to the 'Mandate' database maintained by the Cabinet Office from which data are taken for the publications "Civil Service Statistics" and "Equal Opportunities in the Civil Service". Furthermore, my departments contributed to the Schneider-Ross report on under-representation of women, ethnic minorities and people with disabilities in the Senior Civil Service, published on 7 July by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Attorney-General how many (a) race and (b) sex discrimination cases have been lodged against the CPS at industrial/employment tribunals by CPS staff in each of the last five years; and how many of the cases within (a) and (b) were (i) successfully pursued to a tribunal decision favourable to the applicant, (ii) settled and (iii) discontinued. [90379]

The Attorney-General: The statistics from April 1994 until March 1999 are set out in the following table. My hon. Friend's attention is drawn to the footnote which accompanies the table.

	Cases lodged	Result favourable to applicant	Settled	Discontinued	Ongoing
Race discrimination cases lodged by CPS staff
April 1994 to March 1995	—	—	—	—	—
April 1995 to March 1996	2	—	—	1	[1]1
April 1996 to March 1997	1	—	—	[1]1	—
April 1997 to March 1998	3	1	—	1	[1]1
April 1998 to March 1999	8	[1]1	[1]3	[1]1	[1]3
Sex discrimination cases lodged by CPS staff
April 1994 to March 1995	—	—	—	—	—
April 1995 to March 1996	1	—	—	—	[1]1
April 1996 to March 1997	2	—	—	[1]2	—
April 1997 to March 1998	2	—	—	[1]1	[1]1
April 1998 to March 1999	6	[1]1	—	[1]2	[1]3

[1] The table includes one case claiming race and sex discrimination

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Attorney-General (1) what plans he has to review the operation of performance appraisal reports in the CPS in the light of the Bamieh case; [90377]

(2) what plans he has to review the operation of CPS promotion boards following the Bamieh case; [90378]

(3) what plans he has to review the operation of acting up arrangements in the CPS following the Bamieh case. [90380]

The Attorney-General: The recent decision of the Employment Tribunal, to which I believe my hon. Friend refers, concerns a case brought by Mrs. Bamieh against the Crown Prosecution Service relating to events which took place after 1 July 1997 and before 22 June 1998. The Tribunal found for Mrs. Bamieh in respect of the conduct of a promotion board that took place in 1998 but against her in the other three matters that she put forward.

Mrs. Bamieh's complaint in relation to her performance appraisal report in 1998 failed; however, the Crown Prosecution Service, in any event, introduced a new performance appraisal report that year. The appraisal system is being kept under regular review.

Equally, the Tribunal did not find that Mrs. Bamieh was discriminated against in relation to deputising and temporary promotion procedures; however, it did make observations about the systems in place. The deputising and temporary promotion procedures are currently under review and are being discussed with the departmental Trade Unions. The comments made by the Tribunal are being taken into account.

The Tribunal's Decision in relation to the conduct of the promotion boards is being taken very seriously by the Crown Prosecution Service, which is currently reviewing its promotion board procedures.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Attorney-General how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91023]

The Attorney-General: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the integrated transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

My Departments have completed green transport plans for their headquarters buildings and are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with the target set in the White Paper. The plans include measures to reduce single occupancy car use by employees for commuting and business travel, including ensuring that journeys are necessary, by making available loans for the purchase of season tickets for public transport and bicycles, and by providing secure bicycle storage facilities and showers.

Racism (Disciplinary Action)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Attorney-General if the remarks made by the Director of Public Prosecutions in early May 1999 to a Law Society meeting of ethnic minority lawyers, concerning disciplinary action against staff found to have committed racist behaviour or made racist comments, represent Government policy. [90381]

The Attorney-General: Government policy is to deliver real change in race equality in Britain through policy formulation and implementation. The Government do not condone racist behaviour of any sort. This policy applies to the Crown Prosecution Service, and those who are found to display racist behaviour or attitudes will have action taken against them under the Service's disciplinary code.

DEFENCE

Deployment

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of (a) Army, (b) Royal Navy and (c) Royal Air Force personnel are currently committed to active service operations; and what percentage are warned to deploy to such operations. [88124]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 24 June 1999]: (a) Of the Army, 28.6 per cent. actually deployed on operations. The total percentage of the Army committed to operations is 47 per cent. This includes not only the troops actually deployed, but those preparing for imminent deployment as well as those who are in the process of post-deployment recovery and recuperation.

(b) Of the Naval Service (including Royal Marines) around 45 per cent. are on operational sea service.

(c) Of the Royal Air Force, a total of 40 per cent. of personnel are currently deployed, ready to deploy or in immediate support of operations, based in UK and abroad.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the establishment for orthopaedic surgeons at the Royal Hospital, Haslar on the basis of the full implementation of Defence Cost Study 15. [88339]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 25 June 1999]: Following Defence Cost Study 15, it was agreed that eight orthopaedic surgeons were required at the Royal Hospital Haslar.

Operation Joint Guardian

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of troops earmarked for Operation Joint Guardian are at present deployed in (a) Kosovo, (b) Macedonia and (c) Albania. [88781]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Of the forces we expect to deploy in support of Operation Joint Guardian, some 73 per cent. are deployed in Kosovo and 21 per cent. in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. None are deployed in Albania.

Armed Forces (Under-18s)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Army committed to operations in Northern Ireland were under 18 years of age on 23 June; and in which units. [89041]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 30 June 1999]: A total of 28 UK Trained Army Personnel under the age of 18 years were serving in Northern Ireland as at 1 June 1999, the latest date for which information is held centrally. A breakdown by individual regiments is shown in the table.

Regiment/Unit	Number
Guards	5
Scots Guards	2
1 Black Watch	2
Royal Regiment Fusiliers	1
Royal Anglian Regiment	3
Green Howards	1
Royal Irish (General Service)	7
Queen's Lancastrian Regiment	3
Royal Welch Fusiliers	1
Light Infantry	2
Royal Logistics Corps	1
Total	28

Age is taken into account in selecting the types of duty in which under 18s can be employed. The Army does not, as a general rule, currently deploy those under 17½ who are usually involved in initial training. The minimum ages currently applied for deployment on active service in Northern Ireland are 18 years for an Emergency Tour, and 17½ for Resident Units where they are confined to duties within the Barracks only.

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the sites of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency visited by Defence Ministers since May 1997. [89621]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 2 July 1999]: Since May 1997, Defence Ministers have visited the following DERA sites:

Farnborough
Malvern
Porton Down
Chertsey
Portsdown West.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the meetings he and his Ministers have held with trade union representatives of staff employed by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency to discuss the Public Private Partnership proposals [90632]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 July 1999]: In July 1998, the Strategic Defence Review—SDR—announced a Public Private partnership—PPP—for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency—DERA. Since then, there have been a number of meetings between Ministers and trade union representatives of DERA staff. Many of these meetings were intended to discuss a range of SDR issues, but the subject of DERA PPP often featured prominently.

Date	Attendees	Location
22 July 1998	Minister (DP), DERA management, staff and trade unions	DERA Farnborough
28 July 1998	Secretary of State, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and trade unions	MOD
28 January 1999	Secretary of State and the trade unions	The Royal United Services Institute
10 February 1999	Under-Secretary of State and trade unions	Defence Industrial Whitley Committee, MOD

Date	Attendees	Location
19 February 1999	Minister(DP), DERA Management, staff and trade unions	DERA Malvern
26 February 1999	Minister(DP), DERA staff and trade unions	DERA Portsdown West
28 April 1999	Under-Secretary of State and trade unions	Defence Industrial Whitley Committee, MOD

The formal method for consultation with the trade unions is through the DERA Consultative Committee, and regular meetings, attended by DERA senior management and MOD, have been held. On a less formal basis, DERA management has taken every opportunity to keep the trade unions informed of progress on the DERA PPP study and staff issues. DERA site managers have also met with local representatives. The MOD study team has a continuing dialogue with both local and national trade union representatives.

We intend this level of dialogue to continue throughout the project.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are currently employed by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency; and how many at each site. [90559]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 July 1999]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Sir John Chisholm to Mr. Michael Fallon, dated 13 July 1999:

I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question concerning the number of people currently employed by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency and the number employed on each DERA site.

DERA also has a small number of staff, currently 64, manning various ranges and facilities in the UK. There are also another 188.5 staff on secondment to non-DERA establishments or lodging in small numbers on non-DERA sites.

I hope that this information is helpful.

Chinook Helicopters

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 1999, Official Report, columns 326–27, on FADEC software, when, between 1989 and June 1994, the FADEC software was redesigned on the Chinook MK2; what was the nature of the redesign work undertaken; and which contractor was responsible for carrying out the work. [89860]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Between 1989 and June 1994, there were 58 design changes incorporated in the FADEC software. The changes (categorised in the table) were all undertaken by the prime contractor Textron Lycoming.

Software	Changes
Improved maintainability of software	7
Improved fault logic	10
Customer request	11
Fault logic corrections	9
Improved accuracy	6
Modification due to Hardware changes	5
Improved Comms link and Qualification test changes	4
Corrections and Improvements in reliability	6

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 1999, Official Report, column 327, on the inquiry into the loss of the RAF Chinook on the Mull of Kintyre in 1994, if he will place in the Library the letters his Department has received from the public requesting the re-opening of the inquiry. [89859]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Correspondence between the Ministry of Defence and members of the public is a private matter between my Department and the individuals concerned. Release of these letters into the public domain could be done only with the consent of these individuals and seeking this for all correspondence on the accident since 1994 could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

RNAS Culdrose

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has (a) to respond to complaints of local residents with regard to aircraft from RNAS Culdrose and (b) to alter air routes used to and from the base to avoid residential areas. [90244]

Mr. Spellar: All complaints concerning military aircraft activity at RNAS Culdrose are carefully considered and where there is sufficient evidence to suggest that a breach of flying regulations may have occurred, a thorough investigation is undertaken. The approach and climb out routes to and from the base are dictated by the position of the runways and the prevailing weather conditions, and although they do not take aircraft over major residential areas, overflight of some individual properties is unavoidable. There are no other established air routes in the vicinity of RNAS Culdrose and every effort is made to mitigate the disturbance caused to local communities within the limitations imposed by the need to maintain operational capability.

Army Widows

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will ensure that widows of all pre-1973 Army pensioners are identified and reimbursed with full refund and supplement; and that reasonable effort is made to make refunds to estates where neither pensioner nor spouse has survived. [90620]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We are making every effort to review the case files of pre-1973 Army pensioners to identify the widows/widowers of individuals who might be eligible for a tax refund. Because of the numbers of files, their age and the way in which they are indexed, the process is not straightforward. Individual cases can be processed more quickly if widows who believe they may be entitled to a refund submit a claim to my Department. We have therefore sought to publicise the possible entitlement, and we are grateful for the assistance of the ex-Service organisations in this. It is more difficult to trace more distant entitlements where no pension is in payment because the scheme member and his immediate dependants have died or (in the case of children's pensions) have reached adulthood. But if claims with supporting evidence were submitted, the Inland Revenue would consider them and make a refund if entitlement is proved.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90825]

Mr. Spellar: My Department publishes statistical data on the age, gender and ethnicity of Service personnel and the gender, ethnicity and the disability status of civilian staff annually in the publication "UK Defence Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Armed Forces Insignia

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what amount of revenue his Department expects to receive from the 3 per cent. reproduction fee being charged by the Ministry of Defence for products displaying insignia of the armed forces. [90776]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Reproduction fees charged by MOD in respect of Crown Copyright material are discretionary. Where they are charged they vary between 1 per cent. and 7.5 per cent. The amount of revenue my Department expects to receive from reproduction fees charged for products displaying insignia of the armed forces is expected to be in the region of £45,000 in the current financial year.

Military Visits

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will (a) list the countries from which military officers have visited Northern Ireland since 1 May 1997, (b) set out the purpose of each visit, (c) set out the nature of the related training programme, (d) indicate which delegations have participated in (i) military and (ii) RUC patrols and (e) indicate which delegations have visited surveillance and observation posts in South Armagh. [89912]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The information requested is as follows:

The New Zealand Defence Attache to London accompanied the Chief of Staff of the General Staff on his St. Patrick's Day visit to Omagh and Ballykelly on 17 March 1998.

Military officers from the following countries visited the Army in Northern Ireland on 1 April 1998 as part of a visit by the Royal College of Defence Studies:

Colonel, Omani Ministry of Defence
Colonel, Spanish Air Force
Colonel, French Gendarmerie
Colonel, Hellenic Army
Colonel, Czech Air Force
Colonel, US Air Force.

Two Russian officers carried out an Arms Control Inspection in Northern Ireland from 17–24 October 1998.

Military officers from the following countries visited the Army in Northern Ireland on 24 March 1999 as part of a visit by the Royal College of Defence Studies:

Air Commodore, Omani Air Force
Colonel, Royal Netherlands Army
Captain, Italian Navy
Lieutenant Colonel, Polish Army
Colonel, New Zealand Army
Colonel, US Marine Corps.

Twelve Czech officers carried out an Arms Control Inspection in Northern Ireland from 21–24 April 1999.

None of the visitors listed participated in military or RUC patrols or visited surveillance and observation posts in South Armagh.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91012]

Mr. Spellar: The information on the number of kilometres travelled on departmental business is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided.

Like other departments, we are working to develop green transport plans in line with the targets for government buildings set out in the integrated transport White Paper in July 1998. These plans, which we are taking forward in the context of wider Environmental Management Systems, will as a matter of course seek to reduce the environmental impact of commuting, business travel and fleet operations—for all departmental sites, and not solely for HQ and other key buildings.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for reassessing the National Radiological Protection Board's report of 1997 on the impact of radiation on British service personnel who participated in atomic weapons tests. [91013]

Mr. Spellar: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the report published by the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) in 1993, in which case I have no such plans: and nothing to add to my responses of 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 534, to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), during the recent Armed Forces Personnel Debate and subsequently in writing. A copy of my letter of 7 July has been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91060]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 306.

Single Currency

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much expenditure her Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur in the future on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if she will make a statement. [91038]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information for the NIO and NI departments is as follows:

(a) The cost incurred to date in preparing for the euro is approximately £80,000.

(b) The expenditure expected to be incurred in the future on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry is estimated at £104,000.

The costs incurred to date have largely been spent on making the private and public sector aware of the implications of a single currency. The largest element of the estimated costs at (b) are based on manpower requirements to complete departmental changeover plans later this year.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Artificial Limbs (Sierra Leone)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many artificial limbs have been supplied and fitted by her Department to victims of mutilation in Sierra Leone; and if she will make a statement. [90497]

Mr. Foulkes: We are not supplying artificial limbs to victims of mutilation in Sierra Leone. An EU-funded NGO, Handicap International—Vivre Debout, are working in Freetown and Bo to help victims of mutilations in this way. To date Handicap International have fitted 76 prostheses. A joint project involving Handicap International and the GoSL demobilisation programme, which we are funding, has recently been agreed.

We are also providing humanitarian assistance and support for reform of the judiciary and legal systems, the independent media, and reform of the police and security forces. Currently we are considering what more we can do to support the implementation of the peace agreement.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many times Ministers in her Department have held meetings with ministers and officials of the Irish Government since 1 January 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting; the Ministers involved, and the names of the Irish ministers and officials at each meeting. [90405]

Clare Short: None.

Bosnia-Herzegovina

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance the Government are giving to Bosnia-Herzegovina to rebuild its economy. [91203]

Mr. Foulkes: At the donors conference in May, we pledged £17 million in new, bilateral, funds to help the future development of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Our objectives are to reduce levels of social exclusion and social conflict through strengthening civil society, to support the establishment of an effective, accountable and responsive public administration and help in the development of viable, well regulated markets.

A team from the Department for International Development (DFID) is in the region this week (12–17 July) to discuss how best to implement these objectives with government officials and representatives of civil society.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funding is available to encourage cultural exchanges with students and Government officials from Bosnia-Herzegovina; and if she will make a statement. [91189]

Mr. Foulkes: We do not provide funding for cultural exchanges with students or government officials from Bosnia-Herzegovina. Our programme provides in-country support to help civil society organisations, to support the establishment of an effective, accountable and responsive public administration and assist with the development of a well regulated market economy.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many kilometres have been travelled on her Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets her Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by her Department's employees; and if she will make a statement. [91029]

Mr. Foulkes: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed a green transport plan for our London headquarters buildings which is awaiting final approval from our Green Minister and are in the process of developing a plan for our office in East Kilbride.

Also, we have committed ourselves to reduce our central London car parking provision by 73 per cent.

Departmental Staff

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many staff are employed in Scotland (a) by her Department and (b) by executive agencies responsible to her Department; where these staff are located; and how many staff are employed in (i) England, (ii) London and the South East, (iii) Wales, (iv) Northern Ireland and (v) United Kingdom in total. [90561]

Mr. Foulkes: The Department for International Development (DFID) employs 410 staff in Scotland based in East Kilbride. A further 746 staff are employed in England based in London. No staff are employed in Wales or Northern Ireland. The total number of staff employed by DFID in the UK is 1,156. There are no executive agencies responsible to DFID.

Children (Disabilities)

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her Department's policy is on children with disabilities. [91195]

Mr. Foulkes: We support a significant number of initiatives around the world aimed at assisting children with disabilities to secure their rights. This is an important part of our wider work in seeking to uphold the rights of all people, and particularly the poor, to economic and social development as well as to the civil, political and cultural liberties and freedoms set out in international agreements. Our policy in respect of disabled children aims to support the implementation of the provisions of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and other associated agreements.

Our work in education provides a good illustration of our approach. One of our key priorities is helping meet the International Development Goal of Universal Primary Education (UPE) in all countries by 2015. In many developing countries, the disabled are a group whose chances of gaining access to primary education are slim. We recognise that reaching them and other disadvantaged groups is a distinct challenge for national governments which requires resources, political commitment and flexibility of response.

In India, we have recently agreed to provide substantial support (up to £34.5 million over five years) for Lok Jumbish, a grass roots movement in Rajasthan, which seeks to support UPE through a range of interventions including the enrolment of vulnerable groups such as the disabled in school. This offers a potential model for developing a more equitable approach to primary education in general, as well as bringing immediate benefits to disabled children. Initiatives such as this are contributing to a wider assessment we are undertaking, with partner countries, of the effectiveness of our support for reaching the "missing children" within the context of overall sector strategies for education.

We are currently taking stock more generally of our work with people with disabilities, and will be pleased to report back on this in due course.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of her Department's budget has been allocated to children with disabilities in (a) Africa, (b) Asia, (c) Latin America, (d) the Middle East and (e) Eastern Europe. [91194]

Mr. Foulkes: The information requested is not readily available. The cost of collecting and recording such information would be disproportionately high.

Tobacco

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to paragraph 8.18 of the White Paper, "Smoking Kills," what steps have been taken, and what funding has been provided, by her Department to help developing countries reduce tobacco dependence and help farmers dependent on tobacco crops to diversify. [91083]

Mr. Foulkes: We fully support the World Health Organisation's (WHO) "Tobacco Free" initiative and the development of an International Framework Convention (IFC) on tobacco control and have contributed £200,000 this financial year. The IFC is expected to set out detailed protocols on the range of measures, including agricultural diversification, which a country could usefully include in its tobacco reduction strategy. Development funds are not used for any purpose which identifiably supports the tobacco sector. Our programmes have explored alternative livelihood opportunities for poor farmers in countries where tobacco is a significant crop.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps she is taking to prevent children in the developing world being exposed to tobacco advertising. [91191]

Mr. Foulkes: In our White Papers on "International Development" and "Tobacco" we clearly state our commitment to working with other governments to achieve a global ban on tobacco advertising and to support an International Framework Convention (IFC) code of conduct for transnational companies advertising tobacco products. We have provided the World Health Organisation (WHO) with £200,000 towards work this year. The universal ban we are working towards, therefore, addresses the issue of children's exposure to advertising in the developed and developing world.

Single Currency

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much expenditure her Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if she will make a statement. [91192]

Mr. Foulkes: We have incurred no expenditure to date. Our accounting software caters for multi-currencies. The cost of possible entry to a European single currency would not therefore be material.

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of her Department's budget is allocated to (a) treatment, (b) prevention and (c) care, rehabilitation and social inclusion in respect of children and HIV/AIDS. [91196]

Mr. Foulkes: We currently spend about £35 million per year directly on HIV/AIDS activities. We expect this to increase in the future. Because much of our work in this area is not restricted to specific target groups, but looks to improve systems which enable more effective national responses to HIV/AIDS, it is currently not possible to identify accurately the proportion of expenditure relevant to children, and a further breakdown thereof.

But we treat with utmost seriousness the issue of HIV/AIDS and children. We are particularly concerned about the growing burden faced by poor countries in caring for AIDS orphans, as well as of the impact on the children themselves. We are working closely with UNAIDS and others in seeking to find ways to mitigate this impact.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her Department's policy is on children with HIV/AIDS. [91197]

Mr. Foulkes: Of the 2.5 million people who died of AIDS in 1998, 510,000 were children under 15. Infection runs faster in children than in adults. Children are not only infected with HIV, but also affected: many have lost one or both parents as a result of HIV/AIDS.

As a consequence, we attach great importance to the particular needs of children. Without a cure, our primary objective is to prevent transmission to children and we are working with others, particularly UNAIDS, to identify ways in which this can be achieved more effectively, for example in preventing mother to child transmission.

Family Planning (China)

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will place in the Library a copy of the report of the independent evaluation of the Chinese family planning programmes referred to by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development on 20 January 1999, Official Report, column 842. [91190]

Mr. Foulkes: A copy of the report entitled: "A review of the role of the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) in China and of the work of the China Family Planning Association (CFPA)" was placed in the Library of the House in November 1996. Further copies are being provided.

Sudan

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if her Department is planning new initiatives in Sudan following the renewal of links between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Sudan. [91193]

Mr. Foulkes: Our capacity to respond to humanitarian needs in Sudan was not interrupted by the withdrawal from Khartoum of our Ambassador and his British staff. Humanitarian aid has continued to be delivered by international non-governmental organisations and UN agencies are we have liaised closely with Ambassador's staff out-posted to Nairobi. The humanitarian situation in Sudan is much better than last year and so far we have committed £9 million.

Ending the civil war in Sudan and finding a just political settlement continue to be the key to enable the Sudanese people to rebuild their lives. The renewal of links with the Government of Sudan will allow us to recommence our close dialogue with the Khartoum authorities on this issue.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

State Opening (Costs)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Council what is the forecast cost of the State Opening of Parliament in 1999. [89927]

Mrs. Beckett: The forecast cost of the State Opening of Parliament in 1999 is £50,000 shared with the House of Lords. Costs are, of course, incurred by others such as Buckingham Palace, the Metropolitan Police and the Ministry of Defence.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Risk Assessments)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons prisoners serving sentences of over four years are not eligible for home leave in their last six months of sentence before probation if they pass a risk assessment. [90114]

Mr. George Howarth: Eligibility for resettlement licence, which replaced home leave in 1995, is set out in Prison Service Instruction 36/1995, a copy of which is in the Library. Some prisoners are automatically excluded from release on temporary licence and would not, therefore, be risk assessed. These are: category A prisoners, those subject to extradition proceedings, and those who are remanded on further charges.

In addition, a prisoner serving four years or more is not eligible for resettlement licence until he or she has completed half the single term, which is the prisoner's parole eligibility date. If the prisoner is refused parole, he or she must wait for six months after a first refusal of parole, or two months from any subsequent refusal, before being able to take resettlement leave. The purpose of a resettlement licence is to assist in the prisoner's resettlement on release from custody. Where parole is refused, this, of course, delays a prisoner's release and accordingly eligibility to take resettlement leave.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce classification of offences for which adjudication decisions are made on prisoners to allow more precise judgment of a prisoner's behaviour in prison when considering the prisoner for probation. [90264]

Mr. George Howarth: A prisoner's behaviour is one of the issues taken into account in assessing risk in a parole review. The weight given to any adjudications will depend on the individual prisoner and the nature and circumstances of the index offence. There are no plans to introduce a more formal system of classification.

Public Safety Radio Communications Project

Mr. Curry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the costs to police authorities of adopting the Public Safety Radio Communications Project; and if he will make a statement. [90272]

Mr. Boateng: I am told by the Police Information Technology Unit (PITO) that the costs of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project (PSRCP) are currently the subject of negotiation between PITO, which is managing the project for the police service, and the contractor British Telecom. Indicative prices have been issued and PITO is now preparing to invite British Telecom's final contractual offer, at the request of the Association of Police Authorities and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what monitoring he undertakes of decisions on criminal injuries compensation to ensure consistency and comparability. [90313]

Mr. Boateng: The introduction of a tariff-based compensation scheme in 1996, under which compensation is assessed on the basis of a fixed tariff of awards for injuries of comparable severity, ensures that a considerable degree of consistency, comparability and transparency is built into the system.

Ministers' general oversight of the scheme does not extend to monitoring directly decisions taken in particular cases. However, the bodies administering the new scheme, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority (CICA) and the Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeals Panel (CICAP), themselves take a range of measures to maximise consistency in decision making, including training events and seminars. The CICA is about to embark on a pilot exercise on the comparative assessment of decisions. The outcome of this pilot, and any ensuing procedure, will be considered by the National Audit Office as part of its current review of the scheme.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to change the rules relating to criminal injuries compensation and the effect of awards on means-tested benefits; and what consideration has been given to staggering awards to ensure recipients are not disadvantaged by the savings rule. [90312]

Mr. Boateng: The Government invited views on ways in which the criminal injuries compensation scheme might be changed for the benefit of victims of crime in a public consultation exercise which ran from March to June 1999. Preliminary analysis of responses has shown that a number of respondents felt that compensation derived from personal injury should be disregarded for the purposes of assessing entitlement to means-tested social security benefits. The responses are now being analysed more fully, and we hope to be able to say what changes might be made to the scheme in consequence later this year.

Dual Nationals

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to allow dual nationals who are released on licence in the United Kingdom the option of serving their licence period in their other country of nationality. [90266]

Mr. George Howarth: If an offender wishes to resettle permanently in another country before his licence period expires, permission to do so may be granted by the probation service, the Parole Board or the Secretary of State, depending on the length of sentence, provided that certain criteria are met. The licence period is an integral part of the custodial sentence imposed for offences committed under United Kingdom law; it is not possible for the enforcement of the licence conditions to be transferred to a foreign jurisdiction.

Prisons (Resettlement Units)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to establish a resettlement unit in each prison. [90271]

Mr. George Howarth: There are no plans to provide resettlement units in all prisons. However, the Prison Service is currently developing a policy framework and national standards for resettlement provision.

Job Applicants (Criminal Records)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation to penalise employers who discriminate against a potential job applicant because they have a criminal record. [90268]

Mr. Boateng: The Government have no plans for such legislation.

The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 provides that any conviction resulting in a sentence of no more than two and a half years imprisonment may become spent after a specified period (depending on the length of the sentence and whether the offender commits further offences within that period). The Act provides that an offender is not normally required to disclose the fact he has "spent" convictions when applying for a job. It also stipulates that the fact that a person has a "spent" conviction or their failure to disclose that fact shall not be proper grounds for dismissing or excluding them from any office, profession, occupation or employment or for prejudicing them in any way in any occupation or employment.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to monitor the effect of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 on discrimination against offenders in job applications. [90267]

Mr. Boateng: The Government are concerned that ex-offenders should not be subject to unfair discrimination in the labour market. The Department for Education and Employment has commissioned a major research study into the employment experiences of ex-offenders, employers' attitudes towards them and their likely use of conviction information under the plans for the Criminal Records Bureau. The research will report in summer 2000 when the Government will consider any policy implications.

Project Funding

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what work is being done to address the effect on the finances of organisations in the not-for-profit sector of the demand for matching funding for projects sponsored by the European Union or the National Lottery. [90307]

Mr. Boateng: A code of good practice on voluntary sector funding is being prepared jointly by the Government and the sector's Working Group on Government Relations. The code will address, among other matters, issues concerning match funding.

European Structural Fund aided projects must be match funded by a national contribution. This ensures local ownership and commitment to the project. There are no plans to change fundamentally these arrangements.

The National Lottery Charities Board does not require match funding. This acknowledges that the Board funds many small local groups and organisations that are unlikely to be able to raise partnership support.

The Directions issued to other Lottery distributors require an element of partnership support from applicants for Lottery funding. This provides evidence of community support for a project and allows many more projects to be funded. The Directions encourage a flexible approach, linked closely to an applicant's realistic ability to raise partnership support, and by giving consideration to volunteer time and in-kind contributions.

Custody (Ethnic Monitoring)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to ensure that the custody ethnic monitoring form is filled in accurately by custody officers. [90270]

Mr. George Howarth: On first reception into Prison Service custody, the ethnic origin of each prisoner is recorded with other personal details on a standard prisoner record. This is a mandatory requirement under the Prison Service Order on Race Relations, a copy of which is in the Library. Reception officers are responsible for obtaining and recording the ethnic origin of each newly received prisoner. The personal details recorded on this form, including ethnic origin, are checked on every occasion of transfer to another prison.

Police Communications

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the extent to which civilian staff recruited to work on police switchboards and communications centres are conversant with police operations and information. [90310]

Mr. Boateng: It is entirely a matter for chief constables to decide the extent to which civilian staff should be deployed on police switchboards and communications centres and to determine what training they need to enable them to carry out their duties.

Prisons (Racism)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to introduce (a) monitoring, (b) training and (c) representation of prisoners to combat racism in prisons. [90269]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service is committed to equality of opportunity and the elimination of discrimination on improper grounds. It has well-developed policies and procedures which are set out in the Prison Service Order on Race Relations, a copy of which is available in the Library. This gives mandatory and recommended requirements covering the policy and practice of good race relations within a prison establishment. All of the mandatory requirements are audited by the standards audit unit of the Prison Service and their implementation determines a prison's success or failure in the audit.

It is a mandatory requirement that in all establishments, ethnic monitoring and analysis must cover allocation to work, accommodation, education/training, adjudications, temporary release, segregation and requests/complaints. Furthermore, the Prison Service recommends ethnic monitoring is undertaken in other areas, such as random drug testing and random searches. It is also strongly recommended that ethnic monitoring takes place on a monthly basis, collated quarterly and forwarded to the appropriate area office at Prison Service headquarters. These measures are taken to ensure that any possible racial discrimination in the decision making process is quickly identified so that suitable action can be taken.

All members of Prison Service staff in a prison, including civilian and auxiliary grades, must be provided with race relations training at local level. A revised and updated local race relations training pack has recently been piloted in a number of prison establishments and the completed document should be distributed in the autumn. Every prison establishment has a race relations liaison officer and a race relations management team, meeting at least quarterly. It is a mandatory requirement that the liaison officer and all members of the race relations management team attend the appropriate central training course.

The race relations management teams develop local race relations strategies and monitor performance to ensure implementation of the national policy. Prisoner representation is recommended on this team in order to increase both staff and prisoner perceptions about ethnic minority issues. Where there are practical difficulties in having prisoner representation on the team, such as at a local prison with a high turnover of prisoners, prisons are advised to have a prisoner sub-group chaired by the race relations liaison officer. An increasing number of prisons are involving prisoners in this way and Prison Service headquarters is encouraging them to do so.

Prisoners (Licence Period)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the length of licence period a prisoner receives in relation to the length of sentence served. [90265]

Mr. Boateng: The Criminal Justice Act 1991 sets out the arrangements for the release on licence of determinate sentence prisoners. Under the Act, prisoners serving a sentence of 12 months or more but less than four years must be released on licence at the half-way point of the sentence. Those serving a determinate sentence of four years or more are eligible for release on licence at the half-way point of the sentence and in any event must be released on licence at the two thirds point. Prisoners serving a sentence of less than 12 months must be released unconditionally at the half-way point.

Under the home detention curfew arrangements introduced by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, there is now provision for some determinate sentence prisoners to be released on licence up to a maximum of two months earlier than under the arrangements above. These provisions apply only to prisoners aged 18 or over who are serving a sentence of more than three months but less than four years. Prisoners released on this scheme are monitored by electronic tagging.

Finally, under section 58 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, where a court proposes to impose a custodial sentence for a sexual or violent offence, and considers that the normal licence period under the Criminal Justice Act 1991 would not be adequate, it may now pass an extended sentence on that offender. This means in effect that the offender will be subject to a longer period of supervision on licence.

The Government have no current plans to change these arrangements.

Witnesses

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to ensure that police keep in close contact with witnesses about progress on cases in which they are involved; and what guidelines he has issued on the subject. [90309]

Mr. Boateng: The 1996 Victim's Charter outlines the standards of service that victims and witnesses can expect from the police and the other criminal justice agencies. The Charter standards are monitored regularly by the interdepartmental Victims Steering Group, chaired by the Home Office. A review of the Charter itself will begin next year. The review will take into account both changes in legislation and new non-legislative measures, including those measures introduced as a result of the Macpherson Inquiry into the murder of Stephen Lawrence.

Victim Support

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress made with the National Victim Support help line since it was established; what activities it undertakes apart from referring callers to local victim support groups; and what monitoring he undertakes of its work. [90308]

Mr. Boateng: Victim Support's telephone Supportline has dealt with more than 10,000 calls since its inception in February 1998. The majority of callers are victims of crime, who are provided with emotional support and practical information and advice according to need. Among other things, callers can be offered details of, or referral to, their local victim support scheme and other sources of help and information as appropriate. Supportline also provides an easily accessible Victim Support number for use by other agencies in contact with victims and witnesses.

Supportline activities are monitored daily, and formal reports detailing the number and nature of calls are collated and evaluated monthly by Victim Support. Summarising reports are made available to the Home Office on a quarterly basis.

Drug Seizures

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug seizures occurred in (a) 1997 and (b) 1998 in the Northern Region. [90256]

Mr. Boateng: There were 21,840 seizures of controlled drugs in the Northern Region in 1997. Figures for 1998 will not be available until late 1999.

Sexual Offences

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sexual offences (a) were reported and (b) resulted in convictions in the last two years in the Northern Region. [90255]

Mr. Boateng: Figures for 1998 are not yet available. The overall figures for 1996 and 1997 for the North West (including Merseyside) and North East government regions are as follows:

Year	Sexual offences recorded by the police	Offenders convicted for sexual offences
1997	5,581	1,003

It is important to note that the figures for offences reported and convictions are not directly comparable because convictions relate to offenders.

Charity Volunteers

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the total number of hours worked by volunteers in the charities sector in each year from 1992 to the present. [90254]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not available.

The 1997 National Survey of Volunteering from the Institute for Volunteering Research found that, across the United Kingdom, an estimated 21.8 million volunteers were contributing an average of 88 million hours per week—an annual total of nearly 4,600 million hours. This compared with the 1991 figure, the date of the previous survey, of 23.2 million volunteers contributing 62 million hours per week—an annual total of around 3,200 million hours. These figures refer to all types of formal volunteering and include sports, arts and politics. Much of this volunteering will have taken place in public sector organisations, for example, schools and hospitals, but the 1997 survey found that 84 per cent. of volunteers were active in the voluntary sector.

Corporate Manslaughter

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to implement the Law Commission recommendation on corporate manslaughter. [90242]

Mr. Boateng: An inter-departmental working group, which includes a member of the Law Commission, is currently considering all of the recommendations contained in the Law Commission's report number 237 "Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter", including those relating to corporate manslaughter. We expect to receive the working group's recommendations shortly and will then consider how to take them forward.

Probation Service

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the change in the number of Probation Service staff between 1994 and the latest date for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [90587]

Mr. George Howarth: At the end of 1994, there were 16,405 probation staff, of whom 7,776 were probation officers. At the end of December 1998, there were 14,613 probation staff, of whom 7,191 were probation officers. The figures given here are full-time equivalents.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the current number of vacancies for Probation Officers in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [90586]

Mr. George Howarth: Information on probation officer vacancies is not collected centrally. However, information about the staffing requirements of the Probation Service will be generated by the work force planning survey currently being undertaken by the Home Office with the Association of Chief Officers of Probation and the Central Probation Council.

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 249, on European Communities working groups, if he will list the Title VI working groups referred to and indicate how many times each has met. [90399]

Mr. Straw: I will write to the hon. Member.

Dogs

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to local authorities summarising the Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Act 1999 and outlining their specific powers and responsibilities. [90621]

Mr. George Howarth: Yes. Appropriate guidance will be issued to local authorities before the Act comes into force at the end of this year.

HMP Aldington

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many family units will be included in the redevelopment of Her Majesty's Prison, Aldington; and if he will make a statement. [90577]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It has not yet been decided how many family units will be included in the redevelopment of the Aldington site, but we anticipate the requirement will be three to four units.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements in terms of (a) support services, (b) translation services, (c) health services and (d) dietary services will be provided for asylum seekers following the redevelopment of Her Majesty's Prison, Aldington; and if he will make a statement. [90578]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is too early in the procurement process to provide details of the services to be provided once Aldington is redeveloped as an Immigration Service Detention Centre. The Services will be based on the provisions and facilities at the only other purpose designed centre, Tinsley House. A copy of the contract for Tinsley House is available in the Library.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated cost to the Treasury of the plans to redevelop Her Majesty's Prison, Aldington; and if he will make a statement. [90574]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The project to redevelop Her Majesty's Prison Aldington is at a very early stage. Work has just started to prepare the outline specification for the centre, on which planning authority and, later, the detailed Invitation to Tender for a public-private partnership will be based.

In advance of this competitive process, it is not prudent or meaningful to make public estimates of the cost of this project. The actual cost to the Home Office will be offset by making the 200 places currently used by Immigration detainees at Rochester Prison available for prisoner use. The current running costs of Aldington will also be made available to the Immigration Service to set against the cost of the proposed Detention Centre.

Travellers

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with local authorities and police forces about arrangements for dealing with unauthorised camping by travellers. [90423]

Mr. Boateng: I and my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), have held meetings with senior police officers, Members of Parliament, local councillors and others on this issue. My Department published the guidance document, "Managing Unauthorised Camping: A Good Practice Guide" jointly with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions in October 1998.

Police Community Consultative Groups

Mr. Alan Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue non-statutory guidance to the Metropolitan Police Authority with regard to police community consultative groups; and if he will consult the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, and London police community consultative groups on what that guidance should include about the special characteristics of London police community consultative groups. [90525]

Kate Hoey: The Government have no plans to issue such guidance to the Metropolitan Police Authority (MPA). Subject to the passage of the Greater London Authority Bill, it will be for the MPA to decide, after consulting the Commissioner, what arrangements to make for obtaining the views of people about policing matters in the Metropolitan Police District. The MPA will be a local, democratically accountable body, and, in common with police authorities outside London, it will be best placed to determine its methods for consulting the public.

As part of next year's induction process of members of the new MPA, information will be provided to them about the work of police and community consultative groups.

Electoral Procedures

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people attended each public meeting of the Independent Commission on the Voting System. [90527]

Mr. George Howarth: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given in another place by my noble Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, Lord Williams, on 7 July 1998, Official Report, column 124.

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation he (a) has held and (b) will hold in formulating his Department's response to paragraph 46 of the Home Affairs Committee's Fourth report of Session 1997–98 (HC768) on Electoral Law and Administration; and if he will respond to the recommendation in that paragraph. [90991]

Mr. George Howarth: Following official contacts with MIND, the Working Party on Electoral Procedures, which I Chair, has recommended that the restrictions on using psychiatric hospitals for the purposes of electoral registration should be removed, except for those who are detained as a result of criminal activity. It has also recommended that the requirement for a voluntary patient to complete an additional declaration before being registered to vote should be lifted. These recommendations are broadly in line with paragraph 46 of the Home Affairs Committee report referred to by my hon. Friend. A formal response will be made to the Committee when the final report of my Working Party is published in full later this summer.

Experimental Psychiatric Research

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to supply to the hon. Member for Northavon the material referred to in his answer of 15 June 1999, Official Report, column 100. [90948]

Mr. Boateng: I [illegible] to be able to provide the requested information shortly.

Interception Warrants

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons he proposes to extend to three months the validity of interception warrants under the Interception of Communications Act 1985. [90724]

Mr. Straw: The Government's proposals for legislation to replace the Interception of Communications Act 1985 are contained in a consultation paper which I published on 22 June. The reasons behind the proposal to extend the authorisation period of warrants are explained in this document, which is available in the Library, beginning at paragraph 7.12.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with United States citizens concerning the interception regime operated in this country. [90725]

Mr. Straw: I am not aware of any discussions this year between Ministers and United States citizens specifically about the United Kingdom's interception regime. However, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office met senior members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Drugs Enforcement Agency and Attorney-General's Department in the United States last month. He discussed a wide range of issues relevant to the fight against organised crime. Interception was discussed in the context of the Government's proposals for legislation to maintain law enforcement agencies' capabilities against encrypted stored data and communications.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review his proposal not to include a test of substantial harm in the draft Freedom of Information Bill. [90726]

Mr. Straw: We are currently consulting widely on the content of the draft Freedom of Information Bill. It is also subject to pre-legislative scrutiny by the Select Committee on Public Administration and an ad hoc Select Committee in another place, and also of public consultation.

I look forward to receiving their recommendations and other comments, which I will consider fully before introducing the Bill into the House.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the countries within the European Union (a) which have freedom of information legislation and (b) where such legislation contains a public interest test. [90718]

Mr. Straw: The European Union Green Paper on Public Sector Information in the Information Society, published in January this year, identified the following European Union countries as having national freedom of information legislation: Austria; Belgium; Denmark; Finland; France; Greece; Ireland; Italy; Netherlands; Portugal; Spain and Sweden. Ireland's legislation contains a public interest test, as does the United Kingdom draft Bill. We have not analysed other European legislation.

Our analysis has focused on countries with common law jurisdictions, e.g. Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United States of America. The legislation for each of these countries contains a public interest test.

A copy of the Green Paper is available in the Library.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he took to establish the views of MI5 before deciding they should be exempt from the disclosure tests applied in the draft Freedom of Information Bill. [90720]

Mr. Straw: The Security Service has been fully consulted over the provisions of the Freedom of Information Bill.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91031]

Mr. Straw: Distance travelled on official business is recorded only when an allowance is paid per mile or kilometre travelled. I can, therefore, only supply the information requested for travel by bike, motorbike and car. That information is currently being collected from around the Department. I will write to the hon. Member when the information is available and place a copy of the letter in the Library.

My Department's headquarters buildings had green transport plans in place by the end of March 1999.

A seminar was held on 29 April for green transport co-ordinators for the other 26 Departmental sites that will be required to produce green transport plans by March 2000.

No targets have been set centrally for transport (other than the Government-wide one of producing a plan). Trying to set targets that will be meaningful for both our Central London accommodation and the training colleges that are situated in isolated locations will be difficult. My Department is therefore encouraging sites to set their own targets in their plans. I will monitor and review the success of this approach.

In an effort to limit the effect on the environment, the Home Office joined the "London First" clean air charter in 1997, and has been active in setting targets for and monitoring fuel consumption for the fleet.

The Home Office has drafted an Environmental Transport Policy, which is currently in the consultation process. The policy aims to help reduce the Department's impact on the environment by addressing the issues of fleet size and composition, fuel type, fuel monitoring, vehicle maintenance, and driver training.

The Home Office seeks to ensure that each vehicle in the fleet is not only required, but fully used. The reduction of one vehicle in the fleet has a significantly higher impact than improving the fuel consumption of several vehicles.

The Home Office is planning to carry out a combined Green and Efficiency review of the entire fleet. That review will make recommendations, for fleet composition, usage rates and fuel consumption for each fleet centre. We expect to complete the first review within eighteen months using current resources.

The Home Office is committed to reducing the impact that its business travel has on the environment. Before undertaking any business travel, staff and their line managers consider whether the visit/attendance at a meeting is really necessary, whether the objectives of the meeting could be met through correspondence, e-mail, fax or telephone and whether video-conferencing facilities could be used. If it is considered necessary, staff must use public transport unless there are operational grounds for using private vehicles/hire cars e.g. carrying heavy equipment, or if the route is poorly served by public transport.

There are currently two rates of mileage allowance—Standard Rate and Public Transport Rate. The Home Office operates a strict policy when considering the payment of allowances to officers who use their private vehicles for business travel, including prior authorisation from line managers when Standard Rate Mileage Allowance is claimed. This ensures that private vehicles are used only when absolutely necessary.

Whilst those areas which have higher than average business travel have been targeted since January 1999 in an effort to promote the switch to public transport, it is also proposed to pursue the option of a single rate of Standard Rate Motor Mileage Allowance. If adopted, this should encourage the use of smaller cars and further encourage the use of public transport through a reduced rate of Motor Mileage Allowance for larger engine cars. The Home Office also has allowances for the use of motorcycles and pedal cycles for official travel.

A passenger supplement of two pence per mile for the first passenger and one pence per mile for each additional passenger is also available for staff who use their private vehicle on official business as this represents a cost effective and greener alternative.

The Home Office also pays advances for Season Ticket purchase and bicycle purchase for those members of staff who require assistance with their travel costs to work. The advances are recovered through salary over a 12-month period.

Extradition

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) British nationals and (b) Portuguese nationals have been extradited from the United Kingdom to stand trial in Portugal in each of the last five years; and how many have been extradited from Portugal to the United Kingdom. [89572]

Kate Hoey: The information requested is given in the table:

Number of British and Portuguese nationals extradited to Portugal to stand trial in each of the last five years

Year	British nationals	Portuguese nationals	Total
1994	—	1	1
1995	—	—	—
1996	—	—	—
1997	1	1	2
1998	1	—	1

There have been no extraditons from Portugal to the United Kingdom in that period Two requests for British nationals are under consideration from Portugal.

Stop and Search

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the outcome of the study of stop and search undertaken by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) of 8 May 1998, Official Report, column 514; and if he will make a statement. [91180]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the study of stop and search referred to in the reply given to my hon. Friend, the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) is currently being evaluated. An interim report should be produced by the end of July and the full evaluation will be published in September.

The Metropolitan Police have been examining stop and search since 1995, and between April 1998 and March 1999 undertook work under the guidance of the Home Office and subject to independent evaluation on seven pilot sites: Brixton, Kingston, Plumstead, Hounslow, Tottenham, Limehouse and Charing Cross. The aims of the pilots are to:

improve the effective use of the tactic in tackling crime;

demonstrate to the public the contribution of the tactic to tackling crimes that concerns them; ensure it is exercised fairly across all ethnic groups; and ensure it is exercised in a way which minimises damage to community confidence.

I look forward to hearing the outcome of the study.

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many stop and search incidents took place in the Metropolitan Police district in 1998; if he will provide the ethnic breakdown of those stopped and searched; what proportion of such incidents resulted in (a) an arrest and (b) a charge, broken down by ethnic group; and if he will make a statement. [91087]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has provided the following summary of information on stop and search records for the financial year 1998–99. He informs me that the Metropolitan Police does not keep data on charges in the form requested.

Operation Lancet

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the name and rank of each Cleveland police officer who has been served with a regulation 7 notice in the Operation Lancet investigation. [91014]

Mr. Boateng: Notices are issued under Regulation 7 of the Police (Discipline) Regulations 1985 to inform officers who are under investigation of the allegations or complaints which have been made against them and to give them the opportunity to make a statement. As these notices are issued on the basis of allegations, it would not be appropriate to provide the name and rank of officers who have received such a notice.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has undertaken of the risks faced by telecommunications engineers who install and maintain custodial electronic tagging and monitoring equipment. [91188]

Mr. George Howarth: No prisoner is allowed to participate in the Home Detention Curfew scheme (HDC) unless he or she satisfies both a prison service risk assessment and the strict eligibility criteria set out in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Prisoners are not released on HDC if the release would present an unacceptable risk to the victim or members of the public, or if they have a pattern of offending which indicates a likelihood of re-offending during the HDC period, or if they are considered unlikely to comply with the conditions of the curfew.

As to court-ordered curfews enforced by electronic monitoring, an assessment of the suitability of the sentence for an offender is carried out by the probation service as part of the pre-sentence report. This would include consideration of the same risk issues as outlined above in respect of HDC.

There is no reason to believe that telecommunications engineers are at risk from offenders subject to electronic monitoring.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Films

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to encourage cinema owners to commit screen time to British films. [89409]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 2 July 1999]: The Government have no specific plans to ask cinema owners to commit screen time to British films. However, the recent Film Policy review identified a number of measures aimed at improving the performance and distribution of British films. Once established, the new Film Council will take forward this strategy.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many British films financed in (i) 1996 and (ii) 1997 took advantage of capital gains tax reinvestment relief; what was the total value of equity investment in respect of these films; and what are the equivalent figures for the period since April 1998; [89413]

(2) what representations he has received regarding the effect on the British film industry of merging capital gains tax reinvestment relief with the enterprise investment scheme. [89397]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 2 July 1999]: My Department has received representations from one promoter of a film investment scheme. The evaluation of specific tax-based schemes is a matter for the Inland Revenue.

The detailed information requested on capital gains tax reinvestment relief is not available. Figures for the period since April 1998 would be available only at disproportionate cost.

Activity Holidays (National Minimum Wage)

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to the answer of 30 June 1999, Official Report, column 201, if he intends to publish the representations reporting the impact of the national minimum wage on activity holidays. [89956]

Janet Anderson: I take a close interest in all matters of concern to the tourism industry, including activity holidays, but we have no plans to publish any representations that may be made to this Department on the impact of the National Minimum Wage. We would, in any case, pass any representations on to the Department of Trade and Industry, whose responsibility this matter is.

Publication of representations to the Low Pay Commission on the impact of National Minimum Wage is a matter for the Commission itself.

Television Licence Evasion

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many successful prosecutions took place for television licence evasion in the BB postcode area in each year since 1996. [90644]

Janet Anderson: The number of convictions for television licence evasion in the BB postcode area during the period in question was:

Year	Number
1996–97	1,414
1997–98	1,007
1998–99	934

Holidays in Britain

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps the Government are taking to encourage more people to take their holidays in Britain. [90369]

Janet Anderson: The Government's new tourism strategy, "Tomorrow's Tourism", which I launched on 26 February, contains a raft of initiatives designed to promote quality in tourism through improved career opportunities, more sustainable development and increased access to, and better information about, tourism. As our tourism strategy is implemented and we help to develop an even more high quality and competitive tourism industry, we hope that more people from home and abroad will choose to take holiday breaks in Britain.

Cambridge Motivate Project

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) Cambridge University mathematicians, (b) schools in Brent and (c) schoolchildren in Brent he estimates will work within the Cambridge Motivate project in (i) the first year and (ii) the first five years. [90605]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Cambridge Motivate project is a pilot project supported by the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts (NESTA).

The project will involve five volunteer Cambridge University mathematicians, assisted by a number of Cambridge Education Department mathematical educationalists. In the first year, a total of up to 125 students (12 -18) will be involved in the project, to include up to 50 students from two schools in Brent and up to 75 students from three schools in neighbouring London boroughs. Each of those involved will be trained to disseminate their work to five other students in their own schools, so that up to a further 250 students in Brent and 375 students in other schools will be involved in a less direct way. The mathematical problems posed will also be available on the Motivate website for others to explore.

NESTA will support the project for one year. The impact of the project will be evaluated as it progresses and it may be expanded to more students once its impact has been assessed.

New Audience Fund

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if figures on new audiences resulting from the New Audience Fund will be collated by or for his Department. [90604]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The New Audience Fund is managed by the Arts Council of England, which will publish a full report on the scheme in December.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will announce his decision on the future of the Millennium Dome after 2001. [90622]

Janet Anderson: As announced on 4 March 1999, at the launch of the competition inviting bids for the Millennium Dome and associated land, final decisions on its future use will not be taken until 2000, when the Millennium Experience is up and running for all to see.

Trafalgar Square Plinth

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how many times the advisory panel on the vacant plinth in Trafalgar Square has met; [90607]

(2) what discussions he has had with the advisory panel on the vacant plinth in Trafalgar Square. [90609]

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State joined Sir John Mortimer, Chairman, and some members of the advisory panel at their inaugural meeting last month. The full membership of the panel will be announced shortly and I understand that a second meeting is now being arranged.

Seaside Resorts

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with European Commission officials regarding Objective 2 status for seaside resorts. [90601]

Janet Anderson: My Department has made a strong case for seaside resorts to be considered a priority when the UK Government make proposals to the Commission for the revised Structural Funds map. The Government have been involved in many discussions with the Commission throughout the negotiation of the reform of the Structural Funds. For Objective 2, all areas will be considered equally for inclusion on the basis of need.

UK lobbying led to the inclusion of a reference in the new Structural Fund Regulation at preamble 6, which mentions the development of tourism and the creation of sustainable employment. It underlines the Government's commitment to target all areas of need.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions about hostels in seaside resorts. [90602]

Janet Anderson: My officials have regular discussions with the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and are involved in the public consultation exercise on Houses in Multiple Occupation (HMOs). I am well aware of widespread concern that the existence of hostels in a number of popular tourist destinations can cause serious problems. The Government remain firmly committed to introducing a national licensing system for HMOs when the legislative timetable allows. With DETR, we are currently studying the responses to the consultation exercise which ended recently.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Home Department regarding the impact on seaside resorts of the placement of asylum seekers. [90603]

Janet Anderson: I have been corresponding with the Home Office about the placement of asylum seekers in our seaside resorts. I have emphasised the importance of very careful consideration being given to the long-term interests of both asylum seekers and host communities before any decision is taken to place asylum seekers in our resorts.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions regarding transport arrangements to the seaside resort areas of (a) Great Yarmouth, (b) Brighton and Hove, (c) Bournemouth, (d) Torbay, (e) Thanet and (f) Blackpool. [90600]

Janet Anderson: I have had no discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions regarding transport arrangements to the seaside resorts mentioned, nor have any representations from those resorts been made to me. However, as set out in our tourism strategy document "Tomorrow's Tourism", we are in close contact with DETR in taking forward action set out in the White Paper on Integrated Transport Policy for the UK.

Urban Task Force

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what (a) discussions and (b) meetings he had with the Urban Task Force before the publication of its report. [90611]

Mr. Chris Smith: I had a meeting with Lord Rogers and members of the Task Force on 23 March 1999, when they presented their interim report and discussed their emerging findings. We had a further meeting on 16 June 1999 when Lord Rogers and colleagues explained their main conclusions. My officials have also provided information to the secretariat as required.

Pressure Systems Directive

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with owners of historic steam engine collections about the Pressure Systems Directive 97/23/EC; and if he will make a statement. [90843]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 12 July 1999]: My Department has received one representation about the Pressure Systems Directive 97/23/EC. The Department of Trade and Industry, as the lead Department dealing with the Directive, were consulted in replying.

Lord Sainsbury of Turville answered a similar written question about the Directive tabled by Lord Inglewood in another place on 7 July 1999, Official Report, House of Lords, columns 103–04. It is our belief that the historic steam preservation movement, which provides such a valued contribution to maintaining our engineering heritage, will not be faced with disproportionate costs as a result of the Directive.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90152]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 12 July 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out performance against departmental targets for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members in the 1998 calendar year. More detailed information about the percentage of correspondence replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sports Clubs

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 382, what representations he has made to the Home Office about charitable status for sports clubs. [90812]

Mr. Chris Smith: My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport has been in close contact with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office on this issue. I particularly look forward to the forthcoming consultation dealing with charitable status and community based sports clubs, in which I will be taking a close interest.

Single Currency

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91182]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Department has not incurred any separately identifiable expenditure. Activity in this area has been limited to disseminating information to sponsored bodies. I have made no estimate of future expenditure.

Departmental Buildings

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the location, functions, number of staff accommodated and running costs of his Department's and its agencies' buildings in Scotland. [90859]

Mr. Chris Smith: DCMS has no staff, accommodation or agencies in Scotland.

SCOTLAND

Media Relations

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers involved in media relations were employed within his Department at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [84203]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 18 May 1999]: Detailed information on the numbers of permanent civil servants employed in Departmental Press Offices during the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99 was provided in a memorandum dated 16 June 1998 to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on The Government Information and Communication Service (HC 770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House. The number in post in my Department at 1 May 1999 was 30.

All Special Advisers in my Department have had ad hoc contact with the media, but no Special Adviser was employed to deal specifically with media relations at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 or (iii) 1999. One special adviser with particular responsibility for media relations was employed from 5 May 1998 to 6 April 1999.

Wildlife Protection

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposal he has to introduce greater protection for wildlife; and if he will make a statement. [90179]

Dr. Reid: Protection for wildlife was devolved on 1 July and is now a matter for the Scottish Parliament. The only reserved aspect of protection for wildlife is the protection and regulation of the import and export of animals and plants (under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species—CITES).

Post Office

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has made to ministers about the proposed changes in the Post Office as they would affect Scotland. [90774]

Dr. Reid: The Post Office makes a vital contribution to national life in Scotland, particularly in rural areas. I have been fully involved in development of the Government's proposals for reform of the Post Office that were presented to the House by my right hon. Friend on 8 July 1999, Official Report, columns 1175–90. "Post Office Reform: A World Class Service for the 21st Century" reaffirms the Government's commitment to a universal postal service at a uniform tariff. Measures such as the setting of criteria for access to Post Office counter services will ensure that any evolution of the network of post offices will take place with due regard to less populated areas.

Civil Servants

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has (a) made to the Cabinet Office and (b) received from the Scottish Executive regarding changes required in the rules governing the conduct of civil servants because of their involvement in supporting or advising committees of the Scottish Parliament. [90777]

Dr. Reid: None.

Single Currency

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much expenditure his Department has (a) incurred to date and (b) expects to incur, on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into a European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91184]

Dr. Reid: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Rural Transport

1. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for the improvement of transport provision for people living in rural areas. [89475]

33. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures have been taken to improve transport in rural areas since May 1997; and if he will make a statement on progress made. [89508]

Mr. Prescott: This Government have already significantly improved transport in rural areas. Over £170 million is being made available over three years for extra rural bus services and 1,500 new and enhanced services have been set up, many to local hospitals, shops and stations.

Genetically Modified Foods

19. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the decision reached at the Council of Environment Ministers meeting in Luxembourg on 25 June regarding the development, production and sale of genetically modified foods. [89494]

Mr. Meale: I am pleased to announce to the House that the Council reached political agreement on the amendment to Directive 90/220 on the deliberate release and marketing of genetically modified organisms. This directive does not include the approval for sale of genetically modified foods, but it does cover crops used in the production of foods.

I am confident that this will secure better protection for the environment and human health. Tightening of many of the core elements of the Directive and increasing transparency will help public confidence in the regulatory regime, and establishing fixed time periods for the decision-making steps will provide more predictability for biotechnology research and industry.

Urban Renewal

20. Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in the application of the policies set out in the report "Towards an Urban Renaissance" in the east midlands. [89495]

Mr. Caborn: The final report of the Urban Task Force "Towards an Urban Renaissance" was published on 29 June. We are considering the Task Force's recommendations in the preparation of our Urban and Rural White Papers, both of which will be published in the next 12 months.

Urban areas in the Midlands currently benefit from a range of Government regeneration initiatives such as the Single Regeneration Budget, the New Deal for Communities (in Leicester and Nottingham), and from regeneration activity carried out by English Partnerships and the East Midlands Development Agency.

Road Charging

21. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the impact on traffic levels which the Government's planned new charges on motorists will have. [89496]

Mrs. Liddell: A number of studies have indicated that traffic levels could be substantially reduced if local authorities decided to implement packages of measures including road user charges and complementary public transport improvements.

Motorway Services

22. Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the franchise conditions of service station operations on the motorways. [89497]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have no immediate plans to do so, though a recent increase in complaints has led the Office of Fair Trading to conduct a preliminary investigation of its own into the price of food and drink at motorway services areas. We have said that we will wish to consider the case for further Government intervention, either through our formal agreements with operators or otherwise, in the light of OFT's findings.

Paddington Station

23. Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on improving public transport access to Paddington station. [89498]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Underground is currently improving access to its station at Paddington. The improvements include a widened ticket hall, an extended ticket office, a revised gateline and new architectural finishes. The work will be complete in September 1999.

Safe Routes (Schools)

24. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the introduction of safe routes to schools. [89499]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are working closely with schools and local authorities to improve safety and reduce car use on the journey to school. Last week we published comprehensive guidance on travel to school and announced a new pilot programme of assistance for schools.

West Coast Line

25. Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the rail operators of the west coast line about future performance targets. [89500]

Mrs. Liddell: Performance targets for rail operators are matters for the Franchising Director. The franchise agreement for Virgin West Coast provides for the cancellation thresholds relating to call-in to be tightened from April 2003 and, at the Franchising Director's option, further tightened from April 2005. These changes will reflect the expected improvement in performance that will result from the Passenger Upgrade of the line (PUG2).

Trunk Road Network

26. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress made in improving the trunk road network. [89501]

Mrs. Liddell: We have made maintenance our first priority and provided the Highways Agency with the resources necessary to maintain its roads properly. We have increased the funding available for measures to make better use of existing roads. We have established a clear timetable for taking forward the Targeted Programme of Improvements so that all 37 schemes will start within the next 7 years. The net result will be a trunk road network which is safer and serves the needs of users better.

Container Ports

27. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy in respect of applications to build container ports that preference should be given to brown-field sites. [89502]

Mr. Raynsford: Our policy on port developments is that they should make the best use of existing infrastructure, in preference to expansion wherever practicable. In cases where new development can be justified, our view is that ports should promote best environmental standards in design and operation. We are planning to publish a ports policy paper in the Autumn.

Reighton Bypass

28. Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the case for a bypass for the village of Reighton in North Yorkshire. [89503]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The proposal for a bypass of Reighton is the responsibility of North Yorkshire County Council as local highway authority. Any bid for funding for the scheme in the forthcoming provisional Local Transport Plan will be considered on its merits. All schemes costing more than £5 million need to be appraised using the New Approach to Appraisal.

Regional Development Agencies

29. Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in addressing rural needs through the work of regional development agencies. [89504]

Mr. Meale: The Regional Development Agencies will later this month publish for consultation their draft regional strategies; final versions will be submitted to Ministers in October. The Secretary of State has issued statutory guidance to Regional Development Agencies about the content and coverage of regional strategies which includes the requirement that strategies should take account of the particular features of the region's rural areas. Separate non-statutory guidance has also been issued which includes a section on rural policy designed to assist the RDAs in considering the rural dimension of their brief, in particular in preparing their strategies.

Long-distance Buses

30. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he last met representatives of National Express to discuss the long-distance bus network. [89505]

Mrs. Liddell: The Minister responsible for local transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), met senior executives of National Express in April last year as part of the Department's continuing discussions with representatives of the bus and coach industry on a wide range of issues.

Brown-field Sites

31. Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on Government targets for development on brown-field land. [89506]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government's target is that 60 per cent. of additional housing should be built on previously developed land or re-use existing building over the next 10 years.

London Underground

32. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held with (a) Her Majesty's Treasury and (b) commercial interests about the financing of London Underground in 2000–01. [89507]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister routinely has discussions with HM Treasury on a range of issues, including London Transport. London Transport have invited prospective bidders to pre-qualify for the Public/Private Partnership competition for the deep tube lines, and have commenced discussions with Railtrack in respect of the sub-surface lines.

Fuel Duties

34. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on road traffic levels of increasing fuel duties by 6 per cent. a year in real terms over the next five years. [89509]

Mrs. Liddell: The 1997 National Road Traffic Forecasts already take into account our policy of annual 6 per cent. increases in fuel duty until 2002. Continuing the escalator for another two years would reduce the forecast traffic levels for 2011 by broadly 1.6 per cent., assuming there is no significant change in vehicle fuel efficiency.

Local Government Elections

35. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to review the first-past-the-post system currently used for local government elections in England. [89510]

Ms Armstrong: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) on 15 June 1999, Official Report, column 77.

Greater London Assembly

36. Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made with preparations for the London Mayor and Assembly. [89511]

Mr. Raynsford: Good progress is being made. We have announced that, subject to Parliamentary approval of the Greater London Authority Bill, the elections for the Mayor and Assembly will take place on 4 May 2000, and the GLA and functional bodies will assume their full responsibilities on 3 July 2000. In the meantime the Bill should shortly complete its Committee stage in another place; proposals for both temporary accommodation (Romney House, Westminster) and permanent accommodation (at London Bridge City, Southwark) have been announced; and Dr. Robert Chilton has been appointed, on secondment, from the Audit commission to head the work on the transition to the GLA.

M4 Bus Lane

37. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what effect the M4 bus lane has had on journey time for bus passengers from Heston to London. [89512]

Mrs. Liddell: The operation of the bus lane is being monitored by the Transport Research Laboratory. Based on the first three weeks monitoring since the bus lane was opened, buses, coaches and taxis are saving an average time of approximately three minutes during the morning and evening peak periods. In periods of severe congestion, because of incidents elsewhere on the road network, vehicles using the bus lane have had savings of up to 16 minutes on journey time.

Liverpool Vision

38. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to support Liverpool Vision. [89513]

Mr. Meale: Liverpool Vision is a very immediate and welcome response to Lord Rogers's Urban Task Force recommendations. My Officials will work with the new Urban Regeneration Company to make sure its vision of an integrated, vibrant city centre for the new century is delivered.

A11

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made with the plans to dual the remaining sections of the A11. [89492]

Mrs. Liddell: We included the three schemes to complete the dual carriageway on the A11 from the M11 to Norwich in "A New Deal for Trunk Roads in England" published last summer. The Roudham Heath to Attleborough Improvement is included in our Targeted Programme of Improvements (TPI) and construction of the scheme will start in 2001–02. The Attleborough Bypass and the Fiveways to Thetford Improvement were not sufficiently advanced to be included in the TPI but will be the subject of public consultation exercises in 2000–01 so that if, after full appraisal and statutory procedure, they are eventually endorsed, they can be taken foreword without delay.

Planning (London)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action the Government are taking to involve the business community in the reform of the planning system in London. [89493]

Mr. Raynsford: We have consulted widely at all stages in the development of the new planning arrangements for London that will come into operation once the Mayor and Assembly are in place. We have met with representatives of the business community on numerous occasions to discuss the proposals.

GLOBE Projects

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the environmental GLOBE projects carried out by schools; and if he will make a statement. [90400]

Mr. Meale: GLOBE stands for Global Learning and Observations to Benefit the Environment. It offers school children structured opportunities to carry out environmental experiments and compare results with other schools globally using the World Wide Web. In England it is managed by the Warwickshire Wildlife Trust, with a grant from my department's Environmental Action Fund (EAF), linked to private sector support from the ARC Environment Fund and the National Grid Company. The Warwickshire Wildlife Trust assesses the projects carried out by schools as part of its EAF funded work. We in turn assess their performance during each year of grant funding, and will carry out a more detailed terminal assessment at the end of the grant in April 2001.

BA Tail Fins

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many misidentifications of British Airways aircraft have been reported by air traffic control as a result of confusion caused by the tail fin design. [90498]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Civil Aviation Authority has confirmed that no misidentifications of British Airways craft have been reported by air traffic control as a result of tail fin design.

Driving Tests

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason persons who hold a current United Kingdom driving licence have to sit a driving theory test as part of the qualifying test for a public service vehicle licence. [90647]

Ms Glenda Jackson: It is vital that people who wish to drive buses and coaches are properly trained and tested. The theory test examines a learner's knowledge and understanding of road safety matters relating to these vehicles before having skills and behaviour assessed in a practical test.

Seaside Resorts

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to improve transport links to seaside resorts. [90373]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government are working with a wide range of bodies, including local authorities, regional planning bodies, the Highways Agency, the rail and bus industries and transport user groups, to deliver its integrated transport strategy. Where relevant, transport links to seaside resorts would be considered in this work. We are also encouraging the tourism industry to improve information about public transport links and alternative transport modes to tourist attractions.

Beacon Councils

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in implementing the Beacon Council Scheme. [90374]

Mr. Meale: In May we published our Application Brochure inviting councils to submit by 31 July their applications for beacon status. We intend to announce the first Beacon Councils in November.

Planning Inspectors

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if membership of (a) English Heritage or (b) the National Trust is a bar to appointment as a planning inspector; and what are the reasons for these arrangements. [90394]

Mr. Raynsford: (a) Yes; English Nature has a statutory function in the planning process, and is involved in a large number of planning cases. It has been felt that membership might bring into question the requirement that Planning Inspectors should be fair, open and impartial, but at my request this policy is now under review.

(b) No; because the National Trust plays no customary part in the development control process. Membership by Planning Inspectors would be unlikely to call into question the requirement that they should be open, fair and impartial.

Local Government Salaries and Allowances

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what guidelines he proposes to establish for the level of salaries for executive mayors and members of local council cabinets; and if he will make it his policy to collect statistics on the salaries awarded; [90431]

(2) what guidelines he plans to issue for the levels of special responsibility allowances in local government. [90430]

Mr. Meale: As stated in the White Paper: "Modern Local Government—In Touch with the People" (Cm 4014), we will work with the Local Government Association to develop guidance on allowances and the criteria to be applied in determining their level. We do not propose to collect statistics on these decisions, which as the White Paper indicates, are to be taken by individual councils in the light of recommendations from local independent panels.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the London Boroughs that have produced recycling plans; and what actions he proposes to take in respect of those Boroughs that have not yet done so. [90350]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Under section 49 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 all Waste Collection Authorities (WCAs) are under a duty to have in place Waste Recycling Plans. In London, the London Boroughs are the WCAs. All London Boroughs produced recycling plans in 1992.

In March 1998, the Secretary of State directed all WCAs to investigate if their Recycling Plans needed updating. The Secretary of State does not have the power to direct WCAs to update their Recycling Plans.

In London, several Boroughs have submitted revised plans and most of the remaining Boroughs have indicated that they are presently revising their plans. Details are given in the following table:

Borough	Revised recycling plan approved	Revised recycling plan expected

[1] Greenwich and Lewisham are working on a combined municipal waste management strategy

[2] North London Waste Authority and its constituent collection authorities (LBs of Barnet, Camden, Enfield, Hackney, Islington and Waltham Forest) are working on a municipal waste management strategy

[3] West London Waste Authority and its constituent collection authorities (LBs of Brent, Ealing, Harrow, Hillingdon, Hounslow and Richmond upon Thames) are working on a municipal waste management strategy

[4] East London Waste Authority and its constituent collection authorities (LBs of Barking and Dagenham, Havering, Newham and Redbridge) are working on a municipal waste management strategy

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what requirements govern the extent to which county council waste local plans have to include a specific provision for waste incineration. [90853]

Mr. Meale: PPG23 requires local authorities to have regard to the following principles when drawing up their waste development plans:

> the best practicable environmental option for a particular waste stream in a particular location, which is in turn informed by > the proximity principle (dealing with waste as close to its source of generation as possible), and > the waste hierarchy, with an emphasis on waste reduction, re-use and recovery (both materials and energy) before waste disposal options are considered.

"A Way with Waste", the draft waste strategy for England and Wales published on 30 June 1999, gives greater detail on how waste management decisions should be taken at the local level. The strategy creates no obligation to include incineration within waste development plans. It recognises, however, that energy recovery, by a variety of routes, combined with high levels of recycling and composting, is likely to form part of a balanced and integrated plan.

Road Accidents

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria are used by his Department in determining the cost of a road accident for a (a) fatality, (b) serious injury and (c) slight injury; and in each case what is the current figure. [90822]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The values for the prevention of road casualties take account of the following criteria: medical costs, lost production, human costs based on willingness to pay, the cost of police and courts, insurance administration, and property damage. The values attributed to the prevention of death and injury in a road accident in 1997 prices were (a) fatal £902,500; (b) serious accident £102,880; and (c) slight accident £7,970. The value of the prevention of an accident is slightly higher in each case, because there may be more than one casualty. Detailed figures are published in Highways Economic Note 1, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Packaging Regulations

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the results of the consultation process on the Packaging Regulations. [90971]

Mr. Meale: On the consultation carried out in 1998, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment on 28 January 1999, Official Report, columns 335–37. A further consultation on proposed changes to the percentage activity obligations and other issues will be published very soon. The consultation period is expected to last about six weeks.

Maritime Hijacks

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will give the locations of each attempted maritime hijack which occurred for the last year for which figures are available, giving in each case (a) the flag flown, (b) the location of the incident, (c) the material carried and (d) the outcome of the hijacking attempt. [90727]

Ms Glenda Jackson: According to the International Chamber of Commerce's International Maritime Bureau statistics, there were six recorded incidents of hijack for the period 1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999, as follows:

18 May 1998—A Malaysian flagged fishing boat was hijacked in the Malacca Strait. A ransom was paid for release of crew;

5 August 1998—A Belize flagged general cargo vessel was hijacked off Indonesia; it is still missing with some crew;

27 September 1999—A general cargo vessel, flag unknown, was hijacked off Somalia; it is still missing with some crew;

16 November 1998—A Panamanian flagged cargo of furnace slag was hijacked in the South China Sea; all 23 crew were shot dead and the seven pirates responsible subsequently arrested;

December 1998—An oil tanker, flag unknown, was hijacked off Indonesia; the ship was arrested by authorities and prosecutions are expected;

12 March 1999—A Belize flagged general cargo vessel was hijacked off Somalia; the vessel was taken to a Somali port by the hijackers. Nothing further is known.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many kilometres have been travelled on departmental business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by departmental employees; and if he will make a statement. [91015]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed green transport plans covering all our headquarters and main buildings and we are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with the targets set out in the White Paper. These plans include a range of measures intended to reduce the environmental and transport impact of DETR operations, including future reductions in business mileage. The plan for our headquarters buildings includes a target to achieve a reduction of 10 per cent. of business travel miles by car over three years, i.e. by March 2000.

Air Passenger Service Charges

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library a copy of the correspondence between the Office of Fair Trading and the International Air Transport Association about the description of passenger service charges as taxes; and if he will make a statement. [89574]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am concerned about the practice of some airlines of displaying PSC as a tax. My officials have recently discussed the issue of PSC with representatives of the airlines, and are considering their proposals for ensuring that passengers cease to be misled. The Local Authority Co-ordinating Body on Food and Trading Standards believes that such airlines may be in breach of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 and the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988, and has recently issued guidance to this effect to local authority trading standards officers.

The Office of Fair Trading has written to the International Air Transport Association raising complaints that IATA have misrepresented the PSC as a tax, and IATA have responded.

I have placed copies of this correspondence in the Library.

Airlines

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) on how many occasions in the last year he has discussed the issue of slots at Heathrow with representatives of (a) British Airways, (b) Virgin Atlantic and (c) other airlines; [91222]

(2) if he will list each occasion since he took office when he has met (a) British Airways and (b) Virgin Atlantic to discuss the proposed British Airways-American Airlines alliance. [91220]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Ministers in this Department are in regular contact with representatives of British Airways and Virgin Atlantic on aviation matters, including, among other things, slots at Heathrow and the British Airways-American Airlines alliance. It is not the normal practice of government to give details of specific meetings with private individuals or companies.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what indication he has received from British Airways or American Airlines that their proposed alliance is not to proceed. [91224]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have received no communication from American Airlines about the alliance. British Airways position continues to be that the progress of the deal as presently structured will depend on satisfactory competition remedies.

Timber Recycling

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much timber was recycled in each of the last five years. [90716]

Mr. Meale: The information requested is not available.

The Department is working with representatives of the construction industry to develop a strategy to help the industry contribute to the aims of sustainable development. When published later this year, the strategy will address issues such as reducing waste and making more use of recycled materials. In its own operations, the Department follows the advice published in the "Green guide for managers on the government estate" which refers to the importance of using recycled materials in construction and ensuring future recyclability in obtaining best value.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the possible implications for local authorities responsible for street lighting of the introduction of the climate change levy. [90714]

Mr. Meale: The impact of the climate change levy on local authorities will depend on the rates of the climate change levy. The final rates of climate change levy will not be set until Finance Bill 2000. It is therefore not possible to give definitive figures about the impact of the climate change levy on local authorities.

It is proposed that the revenue from the climate change levy will be recycled principally through a 0.5 per cent. cut in employers' National Insurance Contributions. Like other employers, local authorities will benefit from this reduction.

Garden Waste

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the amount of garden waste produced in each of the last 10 years and; and if he will make a statement on (a) the Government's strategy for dealing with garden waste and (b) its policy towards incineration of garden waste. [90715]

Mr. Meale: No estimates are available for the total amount of garden waste arisings. 380,000 tonnes of municipal waste, including garden waste, were collected for centralised composting in England and Wales in 1997–98; 250,000 tonnes in 1996–97; and 150,000 tonnes in 1995–96. (Source: DETR Municipal Waste Survey). Estimates from local authorities suggest that a further 200,000–300,000 tonnes are composted each year at home. Data for earlier years were not collected.

(a) Our draft waste strategy "A Way with Waste" calls for substantial increases in composting and recycling. The Government will continue to work with key players to implement the recommendations of the Composting Development Group to overcome barriers to the marketing of waste-derived compost.

(b) Incineration with energy recovery should not be undertaken without consideration first being given to the possibility of composting and materials recycling. The final decision will rest with local authorities, and depend on their own circumstances and their assessment of the Best Practicable Environmental Option.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library copies of the representations which he has received concerning the application to erect a telecom mast at Chisley Wood, Buckmoor End, Butlers Cross, Buckinghamshire (APP/IT0425/A/99/1024262). [91036]

Mr. Raynsford: I can confirm that copies of the two representations about this application while it was under consideration by Wycombe District Council have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) which Minister will be responsible for determining planning appeal ref. APP/IT0425/A/99/1024262; and if he will make a statement; [91035]

(2) what steps he has taken to avoid any conflict of interest arising in the determination of planning appeal APP/IT0425/A/99/1024262 concerning a proposal to erect a telecom mast at Chisley Wood, Buckinghamshire. [91033]

Mr. Raynsford: The appeal has been withdrawn and the Planning Inspectorate will be taking no further action in the matter.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations (i) his Department and (ii) the Planning Inspectorate have received from Government Departments or agencies about the planning application and appeal relating to the erection of a telecom mast at Chisley Wood, Buckmoor End, Butlers Cross, Buckinghamshire. [91034]

Mr. Raynsford: None.

Leasehold Reform

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if, following the consultation on leasehold reform, he intends to (a) make a statement on whether he will legislate and when and (b) publish the results of the consultation. [91187]

Mr. Raynsford: We are currently analysing the large number of responses to our consultation paper and will publish the results in due course. We are proceeding as swiftly as possible but I cannot yet say when we will be able to announce our decisions.

Road Traffic Reduction

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his plans for an absolute reduction in road traffic levels. [89514]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government are making good progress in implementing the package of measures set out in our Integrated Transport White Paper which is needed to reduce road traffic growth, and to reduce absolute levels of traffic in those places where its environmental damage is greatest. We remain committed to publishing our first report under the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998, on the issue of whether to set a national traffic reduction target, by the end of this year.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Indian Overseas Territories

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he plans to publish the findings of, and recommendations arising from, the recent visit to the British Indian Overseas Territories by Dr. Charles Sheppard; what steps he has taken to protect fisheries in the British Indian Overseas Territories in the light of the coral bleaching in the islands; from whom advice has been received; and if he will establish no-fishing zones. [87384]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 29 June 1999]: Dr. Sheppard's Report is now being printed and I expect it to be issued in the next few days. The Government of the British Indian Ocean Territory (BIOT) intends to give it a wide distribution. The fisheries management policy of the BIOT Government is based on the precautionary approach. Some partial Marine Protected Areas were introduced in the autumn of 1998 and the number of licences available for the inshore fishery for the 1999 season reduced by one third.

Early advice has been received from Dr. Sheppard and BIOT fisheries consultants. After issue of the Report, further consultation will be undertaken in co-ordination with the Department for International Development, who are co-sponsoring an Indian Ocean-wide programme on Coral Reef Degradation.

The establishment of closed areas or other regulatory mechanisms for the protection of the fisheries remain permanently under consideration by the BIOT Government.

Prime Minister (Personal Representative)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what respect Lord Levy represented the Prime Minister in his visits to Syria from 9 to 10 April and to Jordan and Syria from 5 to 10 June; what were Lord Levy's terms of reference; if Lord Levy was accompanied by his Department's officials throughout the visits; if he will list the names of those whom Lord Levy met on each occasion in his capacity as the Prime Minister's personal representative and what was discussed; on what Vote the travel costs fell; what were the experience and knowledge possessed by Lord Levy which led to his being chosen for the mission; for what reasons his Department's Ministers did not undertake the visits; what previous visits Lord Levy has undertaken on behalf of the Prime Minister; and what further such visits are planned. [90287]

Mr. Hoon: Lord Levy paid for his travel costs personally. His visits included calls on King Abdullah of Jordan and President Assad of Syria when he delivered personal messages on behalf of the Prime Minister.

The FCO, through the Embassies in Amman and Damascus, liaised in advance with the respective governments on the timing of Lord Levy's visit. The Embassies in Amman and Damascus made programme arrangements, provided some accompanied transportation by road during the programme and accommodation at our Ambassador's residence. The Embassy in Amman hosted a lunch for Lord Levy to meet Jordanian politicians and officials.

Entry Clearance Applications

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for how long a person who applied for entry clearance for settlement in (i) February, (ii) March, (iii) April, (iv) May and (v) June can be expected to have to wait for an interview in each queue at each post in the Indian subcontinent. [90755]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The figures requested are as follows:

Waiting time in weeks on last day of month

[4] Re-applicants

[5] Calcutta, Colombo, Karachi and Madras do not operate separate queues

Note:

Figures for June are in the process of being compiled and are not therefore available.

The extended queues in Islamabad and Dhaka in particular are a consequence of seasonal pressures. We have deployed additional staff to deal with increased applications for short-term visits. We will deploy further staff as necessary in early autumn to reduce the numbers waiting for settlement entry clearance and bring forward interview dates.

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the average waiting time is for an initial interview by an entry clearance officer in Islamabad. [91084]

Mr. Hoon: Waiting times for interviews vary according to the categories of the application. Some applicants can be issued visas without an interview. The latest figures we have for waiting times in Islamabad for those categories that require interview are for the last working day in May. They are as follows:

	Waiting time
Tier 3
(Visit)	21 days
Tier 4:
Q1 (Right of Abode claimants, dependent relatives over 65, special compassionate cases)	12 weeks
Q2 (Spouses, children under 18)	41 weeks
Q3 (Finance(e)s, other categories)	46 weeks
Q4 (Re-applicants)	53 weeks

The extended queues in Islamabad and Dhaka in particular are a consequence of seasonal pressures. We have deployed additional staff to deal with increased applications for short-term visits. We will deploy further staff as necessary in early autumn to reduce the numbers waiting for settlement entry clearance and bring forward interview dates.

Yugoslavia

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken to give effect to the decision by the General Affairs Council on 26 April to impose additional restrictive measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. [91290]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The additional measures against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia agreed by the Council of Ministers on 26 April included:

a travel ban on President Milosevic, his family, all Ministers/senior officials of the FRY and Serbian governments, and on persons, included in a specific list, close to the regime whose activities support President Milosevic;

a comprehensive flight ban between the European Community and the FRY; extension of the scope of the freeze of funds held abroad by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian Governments to cover individuals associated with President Milosevic and companies controlled by, or acting on behalf of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Serbian Governments; prohibition of provision of export finance by the private sector further to the existing moratorium on Government-financed export credits set out in Common Position 98/240 of 19 March 1998; extension of the investment ban set out in Council Regulation (EC) no 1607/98; widening the scope of the prohibition on the export of equipment for international repression and its extension to include goods, services, technology and equipment for the purpose of restoring/repairing assets damaged in airstrikes;

Member states also agreed to discourage the participation of the FRY in international sporting events.

A Common Position (1999/318/CFSP) confirming these measures was adopted and came into force on 10 May. A Council Decision (1999/319/CFSP) listing those individuals to be covered by the travel ban was adopted and came into force the same day. Immediate steps were taken to implement the ban in the UK.

The Council adopted Regulation 1064/1999 imposing a ban on flights between the European Community and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 21 May 1999. This entered into force the following day and repealed and replaced the provisions of Regulation No. 1901/98, as amended. The ban allows for exemptions, subject to a consultation procedure, for strictly humanitarian purposes.

On 15 June, the Council of the European Union adopted a further Regulation 1294/99 concerning a freeze of funds and a ban on investment in relation to the FRY. The Regulation came into force on 19 June. The regulation provides that:

funds held outside the territory of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and belonging to the Government of the FRY and/or to the Government of the Republic of Serbia shall be frozen; and that no funds shall be made available, directly or indirectly to or for the benefit of, either or both, those Governments.

For the purpose of the Regulation "Government of the FRY" and "Government of Serbia" are broadly defined to include companies, undertakings, institutions and entities owned or controlled by those Governments, and persons acting or purporting to act for or on behalf of those Governments. Annexes list individuals and companies who are deemed to fall within this definition.

The Regulation allows for certain specified exemptions.

The Regulation applies to any person who is a national of a member state, to any body which is incorporated or constituted under the law of a member state, on board an aircraft or any vessel under the jurisdiction of a member state and within the territory of the Community and its airspace.

The Regulation is directly applicable in the UK and repeals Regulations 1295/98 and 1607/98. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Freezing of Funds and Prohibition on Investment) Regulations 1999, which came into force on 25 June, give practical effect to the EC Regulation in the UK and provides for criminal penalties if the provisions of the EC Regulation are infringed.

The Council also decided on 26 April to widen the scope of the prohibition on the export of equipment to include provision and export of certain goods, services and technology to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in order to prevent the restoring/repairing of assets damaged in airstrikes. In line with this decision and pending the preparation of a Regulation to implement it, the UK, while continuing to scrutinise individually all applications for licences to export dual-use goods to the FRY, has granted licences only where the goods are to be used for clearly humanitarian purposes. Following the Council decision, the Commission and member states began preparations to adopt the necessary Regulation. This work has been put on hold, following the end of NATO'S military campaign against the FRY. The UK practice remains in place.

The Government have taken all necessary steps to discourage participation by teams representing the FRY in sporting events in the UK.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91017]

Mr. Hoon: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

The FCO has completed a green transport plan covering its entire United Kingdom estate. This includes the Department's headquarters buildings in Central London and its sole provincial site at Hanslope Park, some 5 miles north of Milton Keynes. The plan aims to reduce car use by employees for business travel by such measures as reviewing rates of mileage payable to users of private cars and bicycles for official journeys and providing improved facilities for secure storage of cycles on official premises and improved locker and shower facilities for cyclists in order to promote cycling and encourage greater use of public transport.

The Plan discourages the use of private motor vehicles for home to office transport to buildings in Central London by severely restricting the number of parking slots available for private use. "Casual" parking on official premises is not permitted. The FCO will continue to provide staff with loans to fund the purchase of annual rail season tickets and, in the longer term, may consider the introduction of loans for the purchase of bicycles.

The FCO has also taken steps to reduce the size of its official transport fleet in the United Kingdom and to ensure compliance with DETR emission regulations through tighter controls on maintenance standards. The trial of a vehicle fuelled by LPG is currently under way.

Portugal (British Prisoners)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British nationals are currently in custody in Portugal but have not yet had charges brought against them; and how many of them have been in custody for more than (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) nine months. [89573]

Mr. Hoon: On 6 July, our records show there were three British Nationals detained in Portugal without charge who had spent nine months, seven months and one week in custody. In addition, another Briton has been detained for seven weeks pending consideration of a request for extradition to the UK.

Tobacco

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 1999, Official Report, columns 333–34, on tobacco, how many requests for help from other countries, referred to in paragraph 5, have been (a) received by posts and (b) referred to the Department of Health. [91179]

Mr. Hoon: No such requests have yet been received via posts to pass to the Department of Health. We remain fully supportive of international tobacco control work and are committed to international efforts, under World Health Organisation auspices, to tackle smoking.

Departmental Spending

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give a regional breakdown of his Department's spending on (a) hospitality, (b) stationery and (c) travel in the last year for which figures are available. [90568]

Mr. Hoon: Expenditure by the FCO on hospitality, stationery and travel in England in the last Financial Year (1998–99) was as follows:

Expenditure	£000
Hospitality[1]	2,289
Stationery	2,538
Travel	1,192

[1] This figure includes the expenditure by the Government Hospitality Fund which provides for State Visits, Guests of Government and functions for all Government Departments

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the location and running costs in the last year for which figures are available of each of his Department's buildings in the United Kingdom. [90570]

Mr. Hoon: The location and running costs—for 1998–99—of each of the FCO's buildings in the UK are listed:

£000

Location	Running costs Financial year 1998–99
Main building, London SW1	2,700

Consular Assistance

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the arrangements for providing consular assistance to Commonwealth nationals in United Kingdom embassies in countries where their nation is not represented; and what charges are made for such services. [90572]

Mr. Hoon: The UK has no responsibility for other Commonwealth citizens in Commonwealth countries. We have no formal obligation to help Commonwealth nationals in foreign countries where they have no representation. By tradition, however, we help where we can. We do not charge for consular protection work, but consular fees are, where appropriate, levied on their nationals.

Departmental Capital Projects

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the capital projects funded by his Department in the United Kingdom for which cumulative costs have exceeded £1 million, indicating the percentage of projects in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) London and the South East, in the last year for which figures are available. [90566]

Mr. Hoon: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has four capital projects worth more than 1 million pounds in the United Kingdom. All are in London and South East England.

Home estate:

Renovation of Old Admiralty Building in Central London.

IT and office automation:

New Windows Office system. This is part of a system being delivered to FCO offices at home and overseas;

Intelligence handling system

Financial Management and Accounts System

Departmental Staff

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the number of his Department's employees based (i) overseas and (ii) in the United Kingdom, broken down by region; and if he will list the total wage bill, by region, of those based in the United Kingdom, providing separately the costs of any London allowances and weightings in the last year for which figures are available. [90567]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: On 1 April 1999, the FCO employed 5,493 UK-based staff in London and the South East and at posts overseas. Of these, 2,217 were serving overseas.

Total wage-bill expenditure on all UK-based staff (including the cost of Salaries, National Insurance, Shift Allowance, Superannuation, Overtime and Recruitment and Retention Allowance) for the financial year 1998–99 was £172.5 million.

Expenditure in 1997–99 on London allowances and weightings, which forms part of the Recruitment and Retention Allowance budget, was £7.9 million.

Departmental Overseas Properties

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list overseas properties which his Department shares (a) with other United Kingdom Departments and (b) with foreign Governments. [90571]

Mr. Hoon: (a) The FCO does not formally share any overseas properties with other United Kingdom Departments. However, around 970 staff from other United Kingdom Departments work in many of our 220 Posts.

(b) In the overseas locations listed, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office shares its properties with foreign governments:

Almaty
Kampala
Kinshasa
Llilongwe
Lima
Minsk
Ottawa
Quito
Reykjavic
Vientiane

United Kingdom/European Community (Payments and Receipts)

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the United Kingdom's total payments to the European Community and net receipts from the European Community were in 1998. [90273]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

Details of the United Kingdom's gross contributions, receipts and net contributions for the 1998 calendar year are set out in Table 3 of the White Paper "European Community Finances" (Cm4382).

HEALTH

Cancer Care

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the effectiveness of using (a) flexible sigmoidoscopy and (b) Haemocult screening in diagnosing for colorectal cancer; and if he will make a statement. [89094]

Mr. Hutton: A large-scale study by the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, about the use of flexible sigmoidoscopy in the early diagnosis of colorectal cancer in symptomatic patients has recently been completed. We will assess the conclusions of that study when it is published at the end of the year.

We have commissioned two pilot sites to test the feasibility and public acceptability of screening for colorectal cancer. The pilots will initially use Haemocult technology for Faecal Occult Blood testing, which has previously been proven in robust research trials.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department spends annually on (a) cancer treatment drugs and (b) laxatives. [89095]

Mr. Hutton: In 1998, the net ingredient cost of drugs used in the treatment of cancer and dispensed in the community in England was £96.1 million. Information about the condition for which drugs are dispensed is not available centrally, and therefore some of these drugs may have been used to treat other conditions.

In 1998, the net ingredient cost of laxatives dispensed in the community in England was £47.0 million.

Information on drugs dispensed in hospitals is not available centrally.

The net ingredient cost is the basic cost of a drug and does not take account of discounts, dispensing costs, fees or prescription charges income.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the patient information packs to be produced under the Cancer Information Strategy will be available on an internet web site; and if he will make a statement. [89085]

Mr. Hutton: The National electronic Library for Health (NeLH) will provide information about cancer services.

It is intended that access for health care professionals to the electronic Library will be through the National Health Service's own secure intranet (NHSnet), and that patients and the public will be able to access it through other routes, one of which is likely to be the internet. It is intended that patient information packs will be made available through the public floor of the NeLH.

The NHS Information Authority will be considering the business case for the NeLH in the near future, with the expectation of having a prototype in operation before the end of the year.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's plans to make cancer care services more patient-centred. [89093]

Mr. Hutton: We are committed to the development of patient-centred care across the National Health Service. It is at the heart of the Calman/Hine report, "A Policy Framework for Commissioning Cancer Services". Patients should be closely involved in decisions about their care and clear information about treatment options and outcomes should be available at all stages.

We are committed to patient-centred care, support and information for both patients and also for families and carers. A recent cancer summit hosted by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was opened by a presentation from a patient. We are also pleased to be supporting the Macmillan campaign, "A Voice for Life", by assisting in the distribution of a cancer information booklet to every patient diagnosed with cancer.

We have set up a new Cancer Care Action Group, to bring together leading cancer voluntary organisations and the NHS to assist with identifying and implementing improvements to the quality of care offered to patients and their families.

Statutory Instruments

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of statutory instruments introduced by his Department into Parliament in (a) 1998, (b) 1992, (c) 1985 and (d) 1973 had the European Union as their legislative source. [89166]

Ms Jowell: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Breast Screening

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the pilot projects to assess the impact of extending routine breast screening to older women were set up; and for what reason the age limit was extended only to women aged up to 69 years. [89365]

Mr. Hutton: The Department is funding three pilot projects set up to assess the impact of extending routine breast screening to older women. The Brighton pilot was set up in May 1996 and will finish later this year. The project in Nottingham started in February 1997 and the one in Leeds/Wakefield started in June 1997. They will complete in 2000.

There is growing evidence to suggest that an increasing number of women aged up to 69 would accept routine invitations to screening. This evidence weakens for women over the age of 70 and from the age of 74 is non-existent. A woman can ask to be screened every three years in the same way as women aged 50–64.

Terminally Ill Patients

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response the Government have made to the British Medical Association's new guidelines on giving resuscitation to terminally ill patients. [90442]

Ms Jowell: The Department is aware that the British Medical Association have indicated an intent to revise their guidance on Decisions Relating to Cardiopulmonary Resuscitation which was issued jointly with the Royal College of Nursing in association with the Resuscitation Council (UK) in 1993. However, the revision has not yet been published and we are therefore unable to comment on it.

Cordless Telephones

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effects of exposure to radiation from cordless telephones; and if he will make a statement. [90432]

Ms Jowell: I am advised that cordless telephones operate at much lower powers to mobile telephones although they are very similar in their principles of operation. There is a substantial body of evidence relating to the effects of high intensity exposure to radio waves and there are national and international exposure guidelines based on the avoidance of these effects. The advice of the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) is that exposures of the users of modern mobile telephones will comply with these guidelines. It is expected that exposures from cordless telephones will be far lower than those from mobile telephones and the relevant European Standards group has said that measurements are not required at these lower powers.

The NRPB's Advisory Group on Non-Ionising Radiation continues to review research on the health effects of electromagnetic fields and NRPB have been instructed to set up an independent working group to assess the current state of research into the use of mobile phones. The findings would be relevant to exposures from cordless telephones also. The group will be chaired by Sir William Stewart FRS, FRSE. The membership and terms of reference will be announced shortly.

Persistent Vegetative State

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS patients are in a persistent vegetative state; and if he will make a statement. [90429]

Ms Jowell: The information requested is not available centrally.

Organ Donation (Conditions)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will bring forward proposals to prevent people selecting the ethnic or religious group of the person to whom they donate an organ; [90986]

(2) how many people who donated organs specified that such organs were to be used for patients of a particular ethnic or religious group in each of the past five years. [90987]

Mr. Dobson: On 6 July, I was told of a case where organs for transplant had been accepted on condition that they shall be given to white recipients only. I immediately ordered an investigation by the Permanent Secretary in the Department of Health. So far, this investigation has not identified any case beyond that originally brought to my attention, which occurred in 1998. I shall take whatever action is necessary to prevent this practice.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91032]

Mr. Denham: The information on business travel is not available centrally.

As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed green transport plans covering our headquarters and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies. The plans include measures to reduce the use by staff of private transport, including initiatives to encourage use of public transport, a review of rules governing the use of private transport and enhancement of videoconferencing facilities. We are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with the targets set out in the White Paper.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make additional funding available in this financial year to Essex Health Authority to enable Mid-Essex Hospital Trust to reduce in-patient and out-patient waiting lists to below what they were on 31 March 1997. [91046]

Mr. Denham: Additional funding of £4.23 million has been made available to North Essex Health Authority in 1999–2000 from the modernisation fund to help address waiting lists in the trusts in the health authority's area, including the Mid-Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust.

Mid-Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust is committed to playing its part and making a contribution to the Government's objective of reducing long out-patients' waits and the health authority's overall waiting list figures.

Stroke Services

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps he is taking to increase the provision of (a) stroke services and (b) doctors specialising in stroke medicine; [90194]

(2) what steps are being taken to spread best practice in stroke medicine. [90195]

Mr. Hutton: Evidence-based national service frameworks are being developed to ensure consistent access to and quality of care right across the country. In December 1998, we announced that the national service framework for older people would include stroke services.

In addition, we are funding a range of initiatives related to stroke including a sentinel audit of stroke services; reviewing the Effective Health Care Bulletin, produced in 1992 on stroke rehabilitation; funding the Royal College of Physicians to develop guidelines in stroke rehabilitation; and publishing a report later this year by the National Health Service Health Outcomes Indicators Group on health outcomes for stroke.

Stroke medicine is not a recognised hospital specialty. The Specialty Workforce Advisory Group advises Ministers on the numbers needed in higher specialist training in the stroke related specialties, geriatric medicine and neurology, to provide fully trained doctors to fill consultant posts in the future. In estimating likely future requirements for higher specialist trainees, it seeks views from the NHS on local pressures and service developments and consults the medical profession.

Consultant Vacancies

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many whole-time equivalent consultants there were in each of the last five years in (a) the National Health Service as a whole, (b) psychiatry, (c) obstetrics and gynaecology, (d) paediatrics, (e) geriatrics and (f) oncology; [91041]

(2) how many new whole-time equivalent consultant posts were created in each of the last five years in (a) the National Health Service as a whole, (b) psychiatry, (c) obstetrics and gynaecology, (d) paediatrics, (e) geriatrics and (f) oncology. [91040]

Mr. Denham: Information on the numbers of whole-time equivalent consultants in each of the last five years in psychiatry, obstetrics and gynaecology, paediatrics, geriatrics and oncology is shown in the table. Information about numbers of posts is not available centrally.

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what, in each of the last five years, was the whole-time equivalent number of unfilled vacancies for consultant posts in (a) the National Health Service as a whole, (b) psychiatry, (c) obstetrics and gynaecology, (d) paediatrics, (e) geriatrics and (f) oncology. [91039]

Mr. Denham: In January 1999, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, during his appearance at the House of Commons Health Committee, indicated that the Department would conduct a survey of staff shortages by the end of 1998–99. The results of this survey will be published in due course.

Contraception

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make emergency contraception available on the NHS to women in advance of their need to use it. [91044]

Ms Jowell: Hormonal emergency contraception is available on the National Health Service from clinics, any general practitioner who provides contraceptive services—not just the woman's usual general practitioner—family planning clinics, youth advisory services, some hospital accident and emergency departments and some genito-urinary clinics. While not to be prescribed for use as a regular contraceptive, a doctor may, under the terms of the licence, prescribe hormonal emergency contraception prospectively where, in his or her clinical judgment, it is appropriate and there is a risk that the usual method of contraception might fail or not be used.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to set up pilot schemes for the prescription of contraceptives by nurses and pharmacists under group protocols, as outlined in the Crown Review of prescribing and administration of drugs. [91043]

Ms Jowell: I currently have no plans to do so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Monsanto

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the trips, facilities, gifts and other offerings of a financial value provided by Monsanto to (a) ministers and (b) civil servants in his Department since 1 May 1997. [88953]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 29 June 1999]: Departmental hospitality records show that, since 1 May 1997, DTI officials have had working lunches with Monsanto on two occasions.

Insolvency

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to make a statement on insolvency. [89559]

Dr. Howells: We have been concerned for some time that for too many people the fear of failure stifles innovation and enterprise. The Insolvency Service was therefore asked to take a fresh look at attitudes to bu ss failures, balancing the needs of bankrupts with the rights of their creditors.

A small number of bankrupts, an estimated 7–12 per cent., may be deemed to be culpable, including those who deliberately set out to mislead and deceive others. But for those who fail for reasons beyond their control, despite their best efforts to save their businesses, we need a new attitude.

The Insolvency Service's study suggests that the bankruptcy laws could be changed to allow people who have put money into their business to hold on to enough to cover the deposit for a new home on a pound-for-pound basis matching their investment up to a maximum limit of, say, between £10,000 and £20,000. This concession would not apply to culpable bankrupts.

We now plan to consult on this proposal and on the possibility of differentiating between bankrupts who have been simply unfortunate and those whose behaviour has been unacceptable. The Insolvency Service study suggests that culpable bankrupts could face disqualification from between three and five years, with exceptionally bad cases being extended to fifteen years. On the other hand, responsible risk-takers could be discharged earlier than at present. Six months instead of three years is suggested.

As well as consulting on these ideas, we hope to introduce some important but uncontroversial amendments to insolvency law as soon as possible, including the possibility of a rescue period for companies in trouble. Building on these ideas, the DTI and the Treasury are also carrying out a joint review of Company Rescue Mechanisms.

As part of the Insolvency Service's study, Official Receivers carried out a survey of business failures during January and February 1999. They found that:

out of 1,412 cases, less than 3 per cent. of failures were attributable to fraud; half of all businesses had traded for less than 4 years, 32 per cent. failed within their first 2 years;

33 per cent. of directors and bankrupts involved were aged between 35 and 45;

the most common reason for insolvency give was the businesses' loss of market or its main customer (19 per cent.).

The Study concluded that a linkage between investment in a business and keeping a limited amount of money to cover a mortgage deposit could have a number of benefits. It could:

remove a real disincentive to set up in business;

encourage better capitalisation of new businesses. A major cause of failure of businesses in their first 3 years is lack of capital; provide an incentive to better record keeping (it claimed to have invested would have to be substantiated). Poor record keeping is another common factor in many bankruptcies.

Market Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the title and purpose of each item of market and opinion research commissioned by or through his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997 stating in each case whether or not the results were published. [89687]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 5 July 1999]: The following table shows all surveys conducted by the DTI and its agencies since 1 May 1997 which involve an element of public opinion research, and which are subject to survey control. No information is held centrally on market and opinion research commissioned by non-departmental public bodies. The table indicates, where possible, those surveys whose results have been published.

Export Licences

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what powers the Government have to revoke export licences; and if he will list the occasions on which licences have been revoked. [90694]

Dr. Howells: Powers to revoke export licences are contained in Regulation 3(2) of the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996 and in Article 7(1) of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994.

Over the years, a large number of standard individual export licences have been revoked for a range of reasons; for instance, because of the introduction of UN trade sanctions or arms embargoes or in response to wrongdoing. It would entail disproportionate cost to provide details of all these licences.

Details of licences revoked between 2 May and 31 December 1997 were set out in the annual report published on 25 March by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. This information would also be included in future annual reports.

Information Society Directive

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress with the Information Society Directive. [90398]

Dr. Howells: The draft EC Directive on copyright and related rights in the Information Society is still under discussion in a Working Group of the Council of Ministers. The European Parliament gave its Opinion in February, and the European Commission have recently published their amended proposal which takes on board many of the Parliament's amendments. As the outgoing German Presidency reported at the Internal Market Council on 21 June, progress has been made on the Directive. However, the common position of the member states is not expected for some time owing to the complex and controversial nature of some of the proposals.

The electronic environment necessitates international harmonisation of copyright laws, and the Government therefore welcome the broad thrust of this Directive and wish to see it adopted as soon as possible. However, there are concerns about certain aspects of the Directive, including the treatment of temporary copies, the approach on exceptions to rights for a broad range of users, and provisions on technical measures. We are pressing in the Council for solutions on these issues which will allow a fair and reasonable balance to be maintained between the interests of all the key players.

Property Purchases

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has assessed of the existence of a preference system for property purchases linking estate agents, mortgages and the availability of purchase options to clients agreeing to take part. [90765]

Dr. Howells: Discrimination against a prospective purchaser by an estate agent on the ground that the purchaser will not be, or is unlikely to be, accepting services is an undesirable practice under the Estate Agents (Undesirable Practices) (No. 2) Order 1991. I understand that the Office of Fair Trading is currently considering a number of complaints it has received on this issue.

Minimum Wage

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of employers, broken down by size of firm, who have been fined for paying less than the statutory minimum wage. [91166]

Mr. Ian McCartney: No employers have been fined. The overwhelming majority of the non-complying employers discovered by the minimum wage inspectors have subsequently agreed to make good the underpayment, without the need for further action. But we expect a number of enforcement notices to be issued shortly against recalcitrant employers. If these are not complied with, they will be followed by financial penalty notices.

Imperial Measures

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if it is his policy to make it a criminal offence after 1 January 2000 for butchers and greengrocers to sell loose goods using imperial measures; and if he will make a statement. [91076]

Dr. Howells: The Weights and Measures Act 1985 prohibits the use, for trade, of units of measurement other than those defined and authorised by the Act. The Act was amended in 1994 to authorise metric units only for the sale of loose goods by weight after 31 December 1999. Imperial units are authorised after that date only as optional supplementary indications of quantity and price, alongside the mandatory primary indications in metric units.

Airbus

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with (a) British Aerospace and (b) his French counterpart concerning the potential sale or merger of the United Kingdom interest in Airbus. [91204]

Mr. Battle: I have regular discussions with both industry and my European counterparts on the future structure of Airbus. All sides are committed to transforming the existing Airbus consortium into a single corporate entity working along fully commercial lines in order to maximise its competitiveness. The Government hopes this will happen in the near future. However, it is for the industrial partners to lead the process and to determine what steps are necessary. At a meeting of the Airbus Governments and industry at the Paris Airshow last month, Ministers asked the partner companies to report by the end of the Summer on their proposed way ahead in transforming Airbus.

Unfair Dismissal

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) men and (b) women have appealed to an industrial tribunal for unfair dismissal during the last 12 months. [90766]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Between 1 July 1998 and 30 June 1999, the Employment Tribunals received a total of 35,017 applications for unfair dismissal. The gender breakdown was as follows:

Male: 22,000
Female: 12,785
Not specified: 232.

Correspondence

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage of mail received in the last 12 months for which figures are available from right hon. and hon. Members was replied to by him within, (a) up to 20 days, (b) 21 to 30 days, (c) 31 to 40 days and (d) over 40 days. [90149]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 12 July 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Gillian Merron) on 11 June 1999, Official Report, columns 403–06, which sets out departmental performance against the target set for answering correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members, in the 1998 calendar year.

The percentage of mail received in the last 12 months from right hon. and hon. Members which are replied to within the time scales specified could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Royal Mail (Transport)

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage the Royal Mail to increase the proportion of post transported by rail. [90752]

Mr. Ian McCartney [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Decisions relating to the transport arrangement for mail are the operational responsibility of Royal Mail management whose business policy is continually to review its methods of transportation in order to improve service to customers.

I understand that Royal Mail are currently looking at a number of initiatives for transferring letter mails from road to rail and the first of these will be introduced between London and Glasgow at the end of August. In addition, a dedicated rail terminal at Bristol is scheduled for completion by Easter 2000, which will transfer an annual 250,000 kilometres of road journeys to rail.

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what percentage by volume of Royal Mail parcels and letters have been transferred from rail to road transport in the past five years. [90852]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I understand from the Post Office that there has been no net movement of Royal Mail letter traffic from road transport to rail in the past five years. Over the period, conveyance of letter traffic by transport mode has remained constant at 70 per cent. road, 23 per cent. rail and 7 per cent.

Parcelforce have transferred 0.5 per cent. of national traffic from road to rail via the intermodal service introduced in June 1998.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to make an announcement on the proposed partial privatisation of BNFL. [91143]

Mr. Byers: I am now in a position to make a statement about the future of BNFL.

On 11 November 1998, Official Report, column 222, my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry announced that KPMG were carrying out an initial review of the options for BNFL's future structure including, but not restricted to, some form of Public Private Partnership (PPP).

BNFL is pursuing an ambitious strategy designed to achieve global market leadership in nuclear business. Its objective should be to grow and flourish in a fast-growing global market by exploiting the benefits of its unique expertise in nuclear clean-up and decommissioning. The acquisition of Westinghouse and winning the opportunity to take part in two major nuclear waste clean-up contracts in the United States at the US Department of Energy's

Hanford site in Washington and at the Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory are an integral part of this strategy.

I have now considered KPMG's report and the subsequent work which my Department asked KPMG to undertake. The report states that the need for Government to approve these major transactions has thrown into sharp relief the difficulties which it can face in judging major commercial transactions of this nature. I agree with this analysis.

It is clear from KPMG's work that a public-private partnership, involving a partial transfer of BNFL to the private sector, possibly by a flotation of part of the equity of the company, would be the best way of injecting private sector expertise and entrepreneurial spirit, while holding to the Government's priorities of rigorous safety, health and environmental standards.

I have therefore decided that, in principle, a PPP would be good for the company, the employees, the taxpayer, and the wider community. Accordingly, I am asking my officials to tender for advisers to provide advice on a PPP for BNFL. Our current working assumption is that a PPP would involve BNFL as a whole. The KPMG report noted that there would be major operational and regulatory obstacles in separating the businesses and that such an approach would run counter to BNFL's vision as an integrated nuclear services provider. Existing legislation provides for the sale of up to 49 per cent. of the business.

Before a PPP is introduced into the business, I want to see BNFL achieve improved safety and environmental standards and I must be sure that the taxpayer will get proper value for money, reflecting the company's commercial performance.

I have therefore decided to take an innovative approach, which will set this PPP apart from the privatisations of the previous Administration, and which will focus on BNFL achieving improved safety and environmental standards, sustained and progressive improvement in its commercial performance, and a constructive partnership between management and workforce in developing the skills and capabilities of all those who work in the business. To this end, the Government will, together with the company, explore the scope for developing an employee partnership scheme, with the aim of ensuring that the employees share in the future success of the business, and that they are rewarded for their part in the progress the company makes towards achieving a successful PPP.

In considering my approach to this PPP, I have taken careful consideration of the recent work and advice of the National Audit Office, the Public Accounts Committee and the Trade and Industry Committee about the lessons to be learned from past Government share offerings to enable the taxpayer to receive due value from the introduction of private capital, reflecting the company's performance and potential for future earnings.

I have therefore set BNFL a number of specific performance targets.

The targets relating to safety and the environment are being developed with the Health and Safety Executive and the Environment Agencies.

Both BNFL and I attach great importance to the health of the company's workforce and to its safety. No less important is care for the environment and the need for BNFL to strive towards continuous improvement in this area with the aim of bringing work practices, culture and performance into line with world-class international standards.

The company will therefore build on its recent record in safety, health and environmental performance by aiming at continuous and measurable improvement in these areas against a new and challenging index, based on best practice and developed in consultation with the Health and Safety Executive and the Environment Agencies.

The new index will reinforce the efforts the company are making to achieve this sustained improvement in achievement in their record on safety, health and environmental protection.

The company, and all the trade unions representing the workforce, will build on their recent success in developing the concept of partnership. This has led to proposals for a new single contract which will enhance skill levels, introduce new competencies and create a flexible mobile workforce generating high value employment opportunities in the communities where BNFL operates. Under the existing Partnership Council involving union representatives, it is intended to monitor progress in implementing the new contract, including measuring targeted improvements in skill enhancement and productivity levels. The company and the unions are agreed that the introduction of a PPP into BNFL could help create a climate in which initiatives to improve productivity would be encouraged and which would underpin and enhance recent progress in establishing a partnership approach within the company. The company will also aim to achieve improvements in productivity as expressed in sales per unit of cost.

The company will seek to enhance its financial performance further through material and progressive growth in the profits generated from ordinary activities. It will also aim to increase the overall contribution made by its US business to BNFL profits, and increase towards 15 per cent. the proportion of BNFL profits derived from the US business. BNFL's progress in winning an increasing share of the US clean-up business will help contribute towards this goal.

In 1997 BNFL set itself the target of achieving cumulative reductions in controllable costs of 25 per cent. by March 2001. This remains the aim: thus far BNFL has achieved reductions in controllable costs of some 14 per cent.

The company has established a Liabilities Management Unit to reinforce the strategic management of its liabilities and will, without compromising safety and consistent with the regulatory framework within which it operates, seek to identify ways to manage them more efficiently and effectively through the development of new techniques, skills and strategies.

The company will also continue to sustain a Research and Technology capability which will contribute to the company's overall business performance and enable it to continue to meet high standards of safety and environmental protection.

These targets reflect the company's commitment to high standards of safety, health and the environment; they focus on the key drivers of value in the business; and they acknowledge the importance of developing the skills of the workforce and of productivity gains. Each target is backed up by an understanding between my Department and the company of how it will be measured, the precise details of which must, for obvious reasons, remain commercially confidential. They form a balanced scorecard of stretching targets which provide BNFL—both management and the workforce—with the opportunity to demonstrate that the company can realise its full potential, in line with its "Beyond 2000" Strategy.

The Government will look to introduce a PPP into BNFL before the end of the current Parliament, subject to BNFL's overall progress towards achieving these targets, as well as the further work which will now be undertaken by my Department and its advisers.

I am arranging for a summary of the key points in the KPMG report to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Plutonium

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if shipments of plutonium from Sellafield are required to be accompanied by an armed escort vessel. [90713]

Mr. Battle: I announced to the House on 18 January 1999, Official Report, columns 364–65, the arrangements for the return to Japan of nuclear materials recovered from reprocessing Japanese spent nuclear fuel at BNFL's Sellafield plant, including the use of armed vessels.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the total cost of providing security for shipments of plutonium from Sellafield is met by BNFL. [90712]

Mr. Battle: The cost of providing physical security for MOX fuel shipments from Europe to Japan are reflected in the value of BNFL's contracts with its customers.

End-of-life Vehicles

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason no conclusion was reached at the Environment Council on the proposed directive on end-of-life vehicles. [91223]

Dr. Howells: At the Environment Council meeting on 24 June, the Presidency concluded that it was not possible to reach a Common Position due to concerns about the date of application of the producer responsibility obligations in respect of existing vehicles. The incoming Finnish Presidency intends to find a solution to this issue during its Presidency, and will schedule a further discussion with other member states on this Directive.

These concerns affect an important industry and need to be considered carefully. I am confident that an outcome acceptable to all can be found.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the application of the national minimum wage to disabled workers on therapeutic earnings; what representations he has received on this issue; and if he will publish them. [90717]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The National Minimum Wage Act 1998 was deliberately designed to be non-discriminatory. If somebody is employed under a contract of employment or any other worker's contract as defined in the Act, he or she is entitled to the national minimum wage. I have received a number of representations on this issue. The independent Low Pay Commission concluded in its first report that "there are compelling arguments for treating disabled people in the same way as other workers". The Commission is monitoring the national minimum wage and will report by December. Officials from my Department, as well as the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Social Security, have been in continual discussions with various organisations connected with disabled and therapeutic workers about the effective implementation for workers with disabilities and in respect of therapeutic earnings.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90535]

Mr. Vaz: No new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by the Lord Chancellor's Department since June 1997; however, the Department has been collecting data in respect of its personnel by gender, race and disability since the early 1990s.

European Community Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 30 June 1999, Official Report, column 214, on European Communities working groups, if he will set out the remits of the working groups listed. [90505]

Mr. Vaz: The remit of the working group on Extension of the Brussels Convention was to report on the possibility of extending the scope of the Brussels Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters to matters of family and succession law, and subsequently to establish a draft Convention on jurisdiction and recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters. The remit of the Rome II working group was to examine the need for and feasibility of drawing up a Convention on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations. The remit of the working group on Revision of the Brussels and Lugano Conventions was to revise the provisions of those Conventions, respecting the basic principles and objectives of the Brussels Convention, taking into account the case law of the European Court of Justice on the Brussels Convention and relevant decisions of national courts on the Lugano Convention, and examining all proposals with a view to their potential usefulness in the operation of the Conventions.

Public Service Interpreters

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress is being made towards establishing a single register of public service interpreters in the Court Service. [90443]

Mr. Vaz: The Court Service, with other users of the criminal justice system, will use interpreters from the National Register of Public Service Interpreters (NRPSI) as the need arises. In civil proceedings, the courts do not provide interpreters; it is for the party concerned to obtain and pay for them. The court can recommend the Institute of Linguists or any other appropriate body.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many persons on the national register of public service interpreters (a) have obtained the diploma of public service interpreting, legal option, (b) hold a legal qualification and (c) can demonstrate that they have more than 100 hours' experience of interpreting in court. [90444]

Mr. Vaz: The national register of public service interpreters is maintained by the Institute of Linguists (IoL), which is a separate body from the Court Service. I understand (a) that there are 224 (English law) and 9 (Scottish law) interpreters with a diploma in public service interpreting, legal option; (b) it is not known how many interpreters have a legal qualification; and (c) figures are not kept to show how many interpreters have more than 100 hours experience of interpreting in court.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 14 June 1999, Official Report, column 53, on ministerial meetings, how many times (a) the Lord Chancellor and (b) the Minister of State in the Lord Chancellor's Department met members or officials in the United States Government between 1 May 1997 and 1 June 1998; and if he will list the dates and locations of each meeting, the US departments involved on each occasion and the names of the US members and officials at each meeting. [90427]

Mr. Vaz: Neither the Lord Chancellor nor the Minister of State had any official meetings with members or officials in the United States Government between 1 May 1997 and 1 June 1998.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many times the Lord Chancellor or the Minister in the Lord Chancellor's Department have met members or officials of the Irish Government since 1 January 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting, the ministers involved, and the names of the Irish ministers and officials at each meeting. [90406]

Mr. Vaz: Neither the Lord Chancellor nor the Minister of State have had any official meetings with members or officials in the Irish Government since 1 January 1998.

Mental Health

Mr. Singh: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Government plans to make known its views on the proposals set out in the Green Paper, "Who Decides: Making Decisions on Behalf of Mentally Incapacitated Adults". [91391]

Mr. Vaz: The Government received over 4,000 responses to "Who Decides?" on the Law Commission's recommendations about decision making for mentally incapacitated adults. Respondents included many charities working on behalf of incapacitated people; local authorities; doctors; professional organisations and those working with the law. We also received a large number of contributions from individual members of the public. There was much support for the key principles: the functional approach to assessing capacity; the factors to be taken into account when assessing best interests; and the General Authority. There was wide-ranging support for Continuing Powers of Attorney. Many respondents also supported the proposals for Managers appointed by the court to replace the current system of Receivers, with appropriate safeguards. Since consultation closed in March 1998, we have been giving very careful consideration to all the issues involved. The Lord Chancellor intends to publish a Policy Statement in October 1999, which will set out the Government's thinking on a number of the issues raised in the consultation paper.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91022]

Mr. Vaz: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. The Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed green transport plans covering all our headquarters and main buildings and are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with targets set out in the 1998 Integrated Transport White Paper. The plans include measures to reduce single-occupancy car use by employees for commuting and business travel.

Employment Tribunals

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what role the Community Legal Service will have in relation to representation at employment tribunals. [90193]

Mr. Vaz: Under the Access to Justice Bill, civil legal aid will be replaced by the Community Legal Service fund. For proceedings before the employment tribunals all help short of advocacy will continue to be available. Meanwhile, the Government are conducting a review of all tribunals to assess the extent to which current procedures and other arrangements, including representation, comply with our ECHR and EU obligations, and to identify the options for ensuring compliance in the future. The Government believe that it would be premature to make any decisions on extending publicly funded representation to tribunal proceedings until the review has been completed. The wider Community Legal Service, through Community Legal Service Partnerships (CLSPs), will provide the framework for comprehensive local networks of good quality legal and advice services supported by co-ordinated funding, based on the needs of local people. The CLSPs will base their planning and funding decisions on an assessment of local needs, which will include the need for help with employment disputes.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Special Advisers

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on what dates Special Advisers from his Department have travelled abroad on official business since 2 May 1997; which countries were visited on each occasion; and what were the names of the special advisers who travelled abroad on each occasion. [88436]

Mr. Blunkett: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on 29 April 1999, Official Report, column 238.

Out-of-school Clubs

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received from out-of-school clubs concerning the basis upon which local education authorities have sought to charge out-of-school clubs operating out of premises owned by local education authorities for their use of the premises and associated facilities; and what response his Department has made. [R] [88958]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 29 June 1999]: Since July 1997, the Department has received no representations from out-of-school clubs concerning charges for the use of local education authority maintained school premises, although in February 1998 we did liaise with the Department of Health on correspondence received by them from The Guide Association about changes made by one Metropolitan Borough Council.

New Deal Conference

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of the New Deal Conference held in Birmingham on 21 and 22 June; and if he will make a statement. [89369]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The cost of the conference was £257,336, including the hire of the International Convention Centre in Birmingham, all costs of production, stage, set, equipment, personnel, facilities, facilitators for syndicate sessions and catering. The conference was attended by 670 delegates, 54 speakers and 34 journalists. In addition to the plenary sessions there were 37 syndicate sessions covering 19 different subjects.

Education Budget

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will state the total budget announced since May 1997 for (a) local recruitment measures, (b) family numeracy, (c) summer numeracy schools, (d) numeracy at Key Stage 3, (e) literacy at Key Stage 3, (f) summer literacy schools, (g) special educational needs, (h) work-related learning, (i) Social Inclusion-Pupil Support, (j) National Grid for Learning, (k) Education for Travellers and Displaced Persons, (l) Expanding Local Authority Music Services and (m) New Deal for Schools Phase 3 stating what amount and what percentage of that budget in each financial year is to be (i) spent within his Department, agencies and non-Departmental Public Bodies and (ii) allocated in grants. [89471]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 2 July 1999]: A reply to this question could be supplied only at disproportionate cost. General information on expenditure by the Department for Education and Employment, agencies and non-Departmental Public Bodies is given in the annual Departmental Reports, copies of which are held in the Library.

Action Zones

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 19 April 1999, Official Report, column 435, on action zones, if he will list actual and planned expenditure in each of the last three financial years by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies on (a) market research, (b) conferences, (c) direct mail, (d) advertising and publicity, (e) opinion polling, (f) web sites, (g) hospitality, (h) central administration costs and (i) external consultants and advisers in relation (1) to local recruitment measures, (2) literacy at Key Stage 3, (3) numeracy at Key Stage 3, (4) summer numeracy schools, (5) family numeracy, (6) work-related learning, (7) social inclusion-pupil support, (8) education of travellers and displaced persons and (9) expanding local authority music services. [89622]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 2 July 1999]: Expenditure is as follows:

	1998 Actual	1999-2000 Actual to date	1999-2000 Planned
(a) Market Research	0	0	0
(b) Conferences	254,735	11,359	27,000
(c) Direct Mail	3,496	0	0
(d) Advertising and Publicity	124,825	0	0
(e) Opinion Polling	0	0	0
(f) Website	0	0	10,000
(g) Hospitality	1,220	638	2,550
(h) Central Administration Costs	539,693	123,555	459,664
(i) External Consultants and Advisers	219,202	36,900	176,593

No details are available prior to the financial year 1998–99—the first zones started work in September 1998. We cannot provide a further breakdown of the figures into categories 1–9 above because this information is not held by the department and/or identifying it would incur disproportionate cost.

New Deal

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what (a) consultation he has had with the Better Regulation Task Force and (b) assessment he has made of its initiatives in assessing the administrative burdens on employers of involvement in the New Deal. [89421]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 2 July 1999]: The design implementation, marketing and evaluation of the New Deal takes account of the advice of the New Deal Task Force, which has a substantial proportion of its membership drawn from business, including the noble Lord Haskins, who is also the chair of the Better Regulation Task Force.

New Deal (Sunderland)

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of young people in the New Deal programme are in jobs without Government subsidy in the city of Sunderland. [90277]

Mr. Andrew Smith: A young person participating on New Deal who finds a job that does not qualify for the government subsidy through the New Deal Employment Option actually leaves the programme. In the period April 1998 to April 1999, 516 young people have left New Deal to go into unsubsidised employment in the City of Sunderland Unit of Delivery.

School Playing Fields

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 403, if he will list the sports bodies which suggested the number of school playing fields sold off between 1979 and 1998, as indicated in his answer. [90259]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The figure was originally derived from national surveys carried out by the Central Council of Physical Recreation. But our calculations, based on experience in the grant-maintained sector (which the Government monitored from 1988) suggest that the 5,000 figure could well be an under-estimate.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 403, what information he has obtained from the National Playing Fields Association about the number of sales of school playing fields between 1979 and 1999. [90258]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have received no information from the National Playing Fields Association about the number of sales of school playing fields between 1979 and 1999; however, we would be happy to consider any information which might be offered.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what statistics he has collated on the number of schools which have their own sports grounds. [90510]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department does not currently collate statistics on the number of schools which have their own sports grounds. However, local education authorities are being encouraged to develop Asset Management Plans which will include comprehensive details of their school premises, including the number of playing fields for each school. These details will be collated by the Department.

Research Assessment Exercise

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total cost of the 1992 to 1996 Research Assessment Exercise. [90177]

Mr. Mudie: The cost to higher education institutions of undertaking the 1996 Research Assessment Exercise was estimated to be £27.3 million, less than 1 per cent. of the public funds for research which will be distributed by funding bodies with reference to the 1996 RAE results.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of higher education under the auspices of further education colleges. [90526]

Mr. Mudie: We are committed to ensuring that everyone who has the capacity to benefit from higher education has the opportunity to do so. The Dearing Report into higher education recommended that the Government respond to increased demand for higher education at sub-degree level and that priority in this expansion should be given to further education colleges. Over the next two years, we are making available an additional 34,000 sub-degree places, the majority of which will be delivered by further education colleges.

Further education colleges have an important role to play in the delivery of higher education. They widen participation by bringing higher education within reach of most communities and attracting people from households with little or no tradition of higher education. Through their strong links with local business, they are also well placed to provide the skills needed by the local labour market and to help students into work.

Our confidence in the contribution played by further education colleges is reflected in the latest figures which show that colleges account for 11 per cent. of people studying higher education in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the individual financial allocations to further education colleges from the FEFC Standards Fund together with the category of each allocation. [90454]

Mr. Mudie: The Further Education Funding Council published a Circular on the Use of the Standards Fund on 1 June 1999. The Standards Fund is intended to recognise and reward excellence, and to enable colleges to have access to funds to help them secure improvement. It will be allocated under four broad strands. These are:

Strand 1: help for colleges which are causing concern to make rapid improvements;

Strand 2: supporting post-inspection action plans for colleges which have been inspected since September 1997;

Strand 3: supporting continuing professional development for lecturers, principals and governors;

Strand 4: funding for colleges performing well—including those which achieve FEFC accredited status or are recognised by Ministers as 'Beacon' colleges—to share examples of good practice.

It is not possible to list the individual financial allocations to colleges at this stage. The Council's first priority is to arrange support for those colleges causing concern and therefore eligible for funding under Strand 1 of the Standards Fund. These colleges have been asked to prepare costed action plans and to submit these to the Council no later than 16 July 1999. Colleges eligible for funding under Strands 2 and 4 have been asked to prepare action plans as soon as possible and by the end of October 1999 at the latest. Strand 3 of the Standards Fund will require consultation and development before training initiatives can be finalised.

The adequacy of costed action plans provided by colleges will be assessed by the Council before funding is agreed. All action plans submitted to the Council will receive a response within five working weeks. To date, an action plan from Knowsley Community College has been approved under Strand 4 funding and a payment of £50,000 made to this accredited and Beacon college.

Pupil Records

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the timetable for the development of a national system of individualised pupil records which will assess (a) the value added by each school and (b) the progress made by pupils within them. [90419]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Value added measures, based on the results of individual pupils and measured between two stages of education require each pupil to be reliably identified. Early National Curriculum test results were not collected in this way but suitable data are gradually becoming available. The 'Unique Pupil Number', which we intend to introduce nationally this autumn, will streamline future data collection exercises. In the meantime, we are aiming to publish Key Stage 3 to GCSE/GNVQ value added measures for each school in the 2000 secondary performance tables.

Schools are also already able to compare the progress made by their pupils (between all the National Curriculum Key Stages, and up to GCSE/GNVQ) with average national progress using a package of information produced jointly in the autumn by the Department, QCA and Ofsted. This is the second year for the package, following an enthusiastic reception from schools when it was introduced in 1998.

Pupil Spending (Birmingham)

Mr. Godsiff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the estimated spending per pupil in Birmingham for the year 1999–2000; and what would the figure have been if the authority had spent 100 per cent. of the funds granted under the Standard Spending Assessment for education. [90851]

Ms Estelle Morris: Birmingham local education authority have indicated that they intend to spend over £516 million on education (other than capital expenditure) in their schools during this financial year. This is 102 per cent. of the Education Standard Spending Assessment, which was £506 million. The Authority's delegated spending per pupil is expected to be £2,372.

School Activity Holidays

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the number of school children (a) seriously injured and (b) killed on school organised activity holidays abroad, which were booked through a tour operator, in the latest year for which the information is available and the previous six academic years, indicating the activity in each case; and if he will make a statement. [90757]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 12 July 1999]: There is no obligation on schools to notify my Department or the Health and Safety Executive when pupils suffer serious injury or death on school visits abroad. The Department therefore does not collect the comprehensive data requested, although we are of course aware of a number of serious incidents of the type described.

New Deal for Schools

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much Government money has been invested in New Deal for Schools initiatives in (a) Bath and North East Somerset and (b) South Gloucestershire, since May 1997. [91157]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following table shows the total amount of New Deal for Schools funding allocated to Bath and North East Somerset and South Gloucestershire Local Education Authorities since 1997–98.

Total New Deal for Schools (NDS) allocations

Phase	Bath and North East Somerset	South Gloucestershire
NDS1—1997–98	1,007,300	412,270
NDS2—1998–99	1,070,059	1,507,180
NDS3—1999–2000	940,201	943,487

School Pupils (Drugs)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice is given by his Department to schools regarding the need for children to be warned against taking controlled drugs. [91133]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department issued Circular 4/95 "Drug Prevention and Schools" in May 1995, which sets out the statutory position on drug education, offers guidance to schools to help them develop and implement programmes of drug education, and advises on how to deal with drug-related incidents in schools.

The Department also published in November 1998 supplementary guidance on good practice in drug education in schools and the youth service. It includes advice for teachers and youth workers on the effective delivery of drug education, and on dealing with drug-related incidents. The guidance was sent to all Chief Education Officers, and is available to all schools free of charge.

Both sets of guidance cover all illegal drugs as well as alcohol and tobacco.

School Grounds (Mobile Phone Masts)

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance his Department has issued to those schools assessing whether to allow mobile phone masts to be sited within their grounds. [90947]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The National Radiological Protection Board—which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health sponsors—is responsible for advising the Government on radiological protection matters. The Department has not issued separate advice to schools or commissioned research on the impact of these masts.

We take seriously the recent public concern about the siting of these masts on school premises and the possible health risks to children. Discussions are taking place with the other departments involved to see what further research and guidance or other action may be necessary.

School Sports

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the education SSA is allocated for school sport or physical education. [90781]

Ms Estelle Morris: Education standard spending assessments are unhypothecated. Local education authorities are therefore free to determine what proportion of their overall resources to allocate to sport or physical education.

Departmental Buildings and Staff (Scotland)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the (a) location, (b) purpose, (c) number of staff accommodated and their wage costs and (d) running costs of the buildings owned, rented or occupied by his Department and its agencies in Scotland. [90857]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Of the Department and its agencies, only the Employment Service employ staff and have buildings located in Scotland.

A complete list of all Employment Service offices in Scotland has been placed in the Library. They are all primarily Jobcentres but some of them also accommodate District Management Teams, Disability Service Teams and Sector Adjudication Teams.

As at 1 April 1999, there were 3,911 members of staff in post in the Employment Service in Scotland, which equates to approximating to 3,667 Staff Unit Year equivalents. The total salary costs in the 1998–99 financial year were £58.034 million and all other Running Costs totalled £22.538 million.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the extent of the compliance with paragraph 79 of the Ministerial Code (a) when he and the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities visited Chelmsford on 28 June and (b) when he and the Minister for School Standards visited Moulsham High School, Chelmsford, earlier this year. [91217]

Mr. Blunkett: In line with the Ministerial Code, I made arrangements to inform the hon. Member for West Chelmsford of my visits to Chelmsford in January and June this year. Unfortunately, my Department's instructions to the conference organisers to inform him about the 28 June visit were not carried out and I have written to the hon. Member to apologise. My office wrote to the hon. Member the week before my visit to Moulsham High School in January.

Single Currency

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur in the future on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91037]

Mr. Mudie: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

Long-term Unemployed

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps the Government are taking to encourage more firms to join the New Deal for the long-term unemployed. [90191]

Mr. Andrew Smith: There has been an overwhelming response from employers to our New Deal advertising and marketing campaigns—some 52,000 have signed employer agreements so far. The Employment Service and its partners are now working to build on that commitment, ensuring it is translated into jobs for New Deal clients.

New Deal (Small Firms)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment the Government have made of the effectiveness of the subsidies paid to small firms as part of the New Deal. [90190]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Early qualitative research with 25 employers (including some employing fewer than 50 employees), carried out as part of the national evaluation of New Deal for Young People, explored views on the wage and training subsidies. Employers clearly appreciated the advantages of the subsidies in reducing costs of employing and training young people. Some respondents expressed the view that smaller employers stand to gain more from subsidies than larger employers, as the savings may make the difference between being able to employ an extra member of staff or not. A report on this research was published in December 1998 and is available in the Library.

Further research with employers will be published towards the end of this year and in the summer of next year.

CABINET OFFICE

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what representations the Cabinet Office has made to (a) Wycombe District Council, (b) the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and (c) the Planning Inspectorate about the proposal to erect a telecom mast at Chisley Wood, Buckinghamshire. [91042]

Mr. Kilfoyle: None.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91018]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The number of kilometres travelled by motorbike or private car by employees of the central Cabinet Office on the Department's business in the last two complete tax years were as follows:

Motorbike

1997–98: 0 kilometres;
1998–99: 691 kilometres.

Private Car

1997–98: 53,913 kilometres;
1998–99: 80,221 kilometres.

Information about the distances travelled by other modes of transport by central Cabinet Office staff, and all the information requested in respect of Cabinet Office Agencies, is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost.

In my Department official travel is undertaken only where absolutely necessary and then, as a matter of policy, by the most cost-effective means.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to his answer of 24 June 1999, Official Report, column 456, what the total cost was of pension contributions paid by the Government (a) to Special Advisers and (b) into the pension schemes of Special Advisers during the periods (i) 1 May 1997 to 30 April 1998 and (ii) 1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999. [90318]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The information, shown by financial years rather than the precise periods asked for, is as follows:

(a) None. Pension contributions are paid direct into the individual Special Advisers' pension schemes.

(b)(i) £290,000 was paid into the pension schemes of Special Advisers in the eleven month period 1 May 1997 to 30 March 1998;

(ii) £413,000 was paid into the pension schemes of Special Advisers in the year 1 April 1998 to 30 March 1999.

In addition, National Insurance contributions are paid at the contracted-in rates.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine TB

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many trials (a) were initially planned, (b) are currently being conducted and (c) are planned in total under the Krebs recommendations; [87577]

(2) how many trials under the Krebs recommendations have been discontinued. [87578]

Mr. Nick Brown: The recommendation of the Krebs Review Group endorsed by the Independent Scientific Group on Cattle TB, was that a scientific study should be carried out in a minimum of 30 trial areas. Twelve areas have been identified so far and work is proceeding in all of these. Work has not been discontinued in any of the areas.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 8 June 1999, Official Report, column 250, if a provisional agenda was available to him prior to the Council meeting. [88219]

Mr. Nick Brown: A provisional agenda for the May Agriculture Council meeting was made available to the European Scrutiny Committee in line with the usual pre-Council scrutiny arrangements.

The right hon. Gentleman will also wish to be aware that the European Scrutiny Committee has agreed that in the interest of keeping the whole House informed of business at forthcoming Councils it is appropriate and sensible for provisional agenda for Councils provided to the Committee to be placed in the House Library. A copy of the agenda for the June Agriculture Council was placed in the Library in this way.

Food Contamination (Belgium)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his officials first learned of the contamination of Belgian food products. [88628]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 28 June 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I gave on 8 June 1999, Official Report, columns 480–81.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food from whom information about the contamination of Belgian food products was first received by his officials. [88630]

Mr. Nick Brown: [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Officials first received information about the contamination of Belgian food products from industry sources who alerted us to articles in the Belgian press.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he first learned of the contamination of Belgian food products. [88629]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 28 June 1999]: I was informed of this contamination incident on 30 May. However, my hon. Friend the Minister of State with direct responsibility for food safety was made aware on the afternoon of Friday 28 May.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has made to the European Commission about the Belgian Government's handling of the contamination of Belgian food products; [88632]

(2) what representations he has made to the Belgian Government about their handling of the contamination of Belgian food products. [88631]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Our views have been expressed fully at meetings of the Standing Veterinary Committee and other meetings chaired by the Commission. In addition, officials have raised our concerns directly with the Commission.

Belgian officials were present at these meetings and are fully aware of our views.

Special Advisers

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the subject and date of each written briefing prepared by his Special Advisers for all Labour Members since May 1997 and the total number and total cost to date of these. [89993]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 6 July 1999]: Special Advisers are appointed under terms and conditions set out in the Model Contract for Special Advisers. Schedule 1, Part 1 of the Model Contract sets out the role and duties of Special Advisers. As well as research for Ministers and reviewing papers, contributing to policy planning within the Department and preparing policy papers, speech writing and liaison with outside interest groups, their role explicitly includes liaising with the Party and helping to brief Party MPs. Records are not held of when such briefings are given. Similar arrangements have applied under successive Governments.

European Single Currency

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur in future, on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [90967]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Following the publication of the Government's outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

Advisory Committee on Animal Feedingstuffs

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made towards the establishment of the Advisory Committee on Animal Feedingstuffs; and if he will make a statement. [91390]

Mr. Rooker: I am delighted to announce the appointment of 13 members to the new Advisory Committee on Animal Feedingstuffs. This Committee will provide valuable independent advice to the future Food Standards Agency and Agriculture Ministers. By examining the safety and use of animal feedingstuffs, which are an integral part of the food chain, the Committee will play a key role in promoting food safety in the UK. Reviewing the implications of new developments, particularly the use of genetically modified materials, will be especially important.

The 13 members and their main area of expertise are Dr. Ian Brown (occupational health), Mr. John Cheetham (local authority enforcement), Dr. Andrew Chesson (animal nutrition), Mrs. Gilli Davies (consumer), Mr. Paul Foxcroft (animal by-products), Dr. John Heritage (novel technology), Mrs. Fiona Hodgson (lay member), Mr. Robert Moore (veterinary practice), Mr. Andrew Peddie (farming), Dr. Helen Raine (feed compounding), Dr. Desmond Rice (feed compounding and veterinary background), Professor Ian Shaw (toxicology) and Dr. Michael Stringer (microbiology). Professor Phillip Thomas was appointed Chairman on 12 April.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the President of the Council how many kilometres have been travelled on her Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets her Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by her Department's employees; and if she will make a statement. [91030]

Mrs. Beckett: Information on business travel is not collected in the form requested.

The Privy Council Office is encompassed by the green transport plan prepared by the Cabinet Office for 68–70 Whitehall. The use of private transport for business travel is discouraged, and claims are submitted extremely rarely.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Housing Benefit

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the review of housing benefit. [90263]

Angela Eagle: Our intention is to publish our proposals for housing benefit reform in a Housing Green Paper later in the year.

Benefits (Pensioners)

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to ensure that pensioners receive all the benefits to which they are entitled. [90370]

Mr. Timms: We undertook pilot projects and research last year to understand more about why pensioners do not claim the Income Support they are entitled to, and what could be done to improve this situation. We are currently exploring options for further activity to encourage greater take-up and we will announce our plans as soon as we are able to do so.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many times Ministers in his Department have held meetings with Ministers and officials of the Irish Government since 1 January 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting, the Ministers involved and the names of the Irish Ministers and officials at each meeting. [90407]

Mr. Darling: I and Ministers of this Department have met with Irish Ministers and their officials on three occasions. The information requested is in the table below:

Date	Location	Social Security Minister	Irish Minister and officials
15 January 1998	Richmond House, London, SW1	Keith Bradley, Parliamentary Under-Secretary	Dermot Ahern, Minister for Social, Community and Family Affairs Tom Mulherin, Assistant Secretary General, DSCFA Mel Cousins, Minister's Advisor, DSCFA Leo Sheedy, Irish Embassy Stephen Coughlan, Private Secretary Gerry Mungan, Principal, DSCFA
25 February 1998	Richmond House, London, SW1	Frank Field, Minister of State	Mary Harney, Tanaiste Seamus O'Moran, Assistant Secretary – Labour Force Development Division, DETE Martin Territt, Press Officer Gerry Donnelly, Advisor Leo Sheedy, Irish Embassy
25 June 1999	Dublin	Alistair Darling, Secretary of State	Dermot Ahern, Minister for Social, Community and Family Affairs Eddie Sullivan, Secretary General, Department for Social, Community and Family Affairs (DSCFA) John Hynes, Director General, DSCFA Deirdre Carroll, Assistant Secretary, DSCFA Tom Mulherin, Assistant Secretary, DSCFA Mel Cousins, Minister's Advisor

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91071]

Mr. Timms: I refer the hon. Member to the Written Answer I gave him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 308.

All-work Test

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 623, if he will describe the special procedures for the All-Work test that apply to claimants with mental health problems. [90819]

Mr. Bayley: Where the medical condition that has caused the incapacity for work relates to a mental disease or disablement, further information is sought from the General Practitioner or psychiatric specialist in order to establish whether the condition is severe enough to justify exemption from the All-Work Test. If this is not the case, or where the position is unclear, a questionnaire will be issued to allow the claimant an opportunity to describe the effect of any physical disabilities and also the general effect of any mental problems they have. Unless it is clear from the questionnaire that the person satisfies the All-Work Test, a medical examination will be carried out. The examination will be offered even where the claimant does not respond to the questionnaire, in order to give people with mental conditions every opportunity to be fully assessed for benefit purposes. This arrangement is different from that for people without mental conditions, who are disallowed benefit if they do not return the questionnaire.

All doctors undertaking examinations meet minimum recruitment standards which must include at least three years broadly based post-registration experience. Most have a background in general medical practice but many will also have additional experience and qualifications in relevant specialities such as occupational medicine and psychiatry. The stringent approval process requires them to undergo training and assessment. This ensures that they have the special skills and knowledge to fulfil their role in providing good quality expert advice to enable a decision on benefit entitlement to be made.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91027]

Angela Eagle: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the integrated transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999, and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed green transport plans covering all our headquarters and main buildings—27 in all, which covers 33 per cent. of staff—and are developing plans for the other 363 buildings on the DSS estate in line with the targets set out in the White Paper. The plans include measures to reduce single-occupancy car use by employees for commuting, including the setting up of car-sharing registers and making travel by public transport more attractive. Staff are encouraged, wherever it is practicable, to share cars for business travel and also to use public transport, especially for longer journeys.

Ministerial Code

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the extent of the compliance by (a) himself and (b) the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), with paragraph 79 of the Ministerial Code when visiting Chelmsford on 28 June. [91216]

Mr. Darling: In line with the Ministerial Code, I made arrangements to inform the hon. Member for West Chelmsford of my visit to Chelmsford with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 28 June this year. Unfortunately, the letter to inform him was not issued. I have written to the hon. Member to apologise.

Single Currency

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much expenditure his Department has (a) incurred to date and (b) forecasts to be incurred in the future on preparation for possible UK entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91086]

Angela Eagle: In preparation for the launch of the euro in the 11 participating countries, on 1 January this year, this Department undertook analysis and preparation work to assess the impacts on DSS at a cost of £100,000.

Following the publication of the Government's outline National Changeover Plan, the Department is currently considering what preparations and costs might be necessary for the introduction of the euro.

WALES

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many meetings of the CJCC he has attended. [89271]

Mr. Michael: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 362.

Official Representation (Brussels)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 5 May 1999, Official Report, column 429, on official representation in Brussels, if he will make a statement on progress with discussions between Welsh Office officials and political parties on the establishment of official representation for Wales in Brussels. [89590]

Mr. Hain: This is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91024]

Mr. Michael: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. The number of officials supporting the Secretary of State for Wales now consists of about 30 people and therefore there is not a formal green transport plan. The Department is co-operating with the green transport strategies for Government offices in London.

TREASURY

Higher-rate Taxpayers

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) basic and (b) higher rate taxpayers there have been in each year since 1979. [88827]

Dawn Primarolo: The numbers of basic rate and higher rate taxpaying individuals between 1991–92 and 1998–99 are given in table 2.1 of Inland Revenue Statistics 1998; figures for the total number of higher rate individuals for the earlier years 1978–79 to 1991–92 are given in the 1994 edition of Inland Revenue Statistics 1994. For these earlier years, the number of basic rate paying individuals can be derived by deducting the number of higher rate individuals from the total number of individuals.

For 1999–2000, there are estimated to be 20.7 million basic rate individual taxpayers and 2.3 million higher-rate individual taxpayers. These figures were derived from the 1996–97 Survey of Personal Incomes.

Employment (Northern Region)

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were in work in the Northern Region in (a) May 1999 and (b) May 1997. [90279]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics, I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Fraser Kemp, dated 13 July 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on employment in the Northern region.

The most up-to-date estimates of employment are published using the Government Office Region geography. The latest Labour Force Survey (LFS) estimate of the number of employed people living in the North East is 1,050,000 for the period February to April 1999 on a seasonally adjusted basis. The comparable estimate for the same period in 1997 was 1,071,000.

Employment estimates based on the old Standard Statistical Region (SSR) geography are still available from the LFS on a non-seasonally adjusted basis for certain quarters. The latest estimate of the number of employed people living in the Northern SSR is 1,282,000 (December 1998 to February 1999) compared with 1,292,000 for the corresponding quarter two years earlier.

Mortgage Providers (Insurance Services)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to require mortgage providers to disclose the level of commission they receive from sales of bundled home insurance; [90817]

(2) what plans he has to ensure that mortgage lenders inform consumers whether purchase of the provider's insurance is a condition of the mortgage they are to take out; [90816]

(3) if he will place on mortgage providers a duty to inform customers at renewal or expiry of a particular home insurance policy that they can exercise the right to switch to an alternative insurance provider if they so wish. [90814]

Ms Hewitt: This and other matters associated with protecting the consumer interest will be considered in HM Treasury's review of whether advice on, and marketing of, mortgages should be subject to statutory regulation by the Financial Services Authority.

HM Treasury will shortly begin to assess the case for regulation.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the current review of the Council of Mortgage Lenders Code will include the practice of linking insurance with mortgage products. [90815]

Ms Hewitt: Yes. The operation of the Code will be reviewed and the Code provides that transparent information should be provided on such linkages.

EU Code of Conduct Group

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the minutes of the meeting of the EU Code of Conduct Group chaired by the Paymaster General on 7 and 8 July. [91002]

Dawn Primarolo: As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 18 June 1998, Official Report, columns 271–72, paragraph 12 of the Council Conclusions of 9 March 1998 states that the Council "agrees that the work of the Code of Conduct Group shall be confidential".

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which United Kingdom tax reliefs were discussed at the recent meeting of the EU Code of Conduct Group chaired by the Paymaster General. [91003]

Dawn Primarolo: Paragraph 12 of the Council Conclusions of 9 March 1998 states that the Council

"agrees that the work of the Code of Conduct Group shall be confidential".

In my answer to the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) 14 June 1999, Official Report, columns 30–31, I listed the UK tax measures which are currently under examination by the EU Code of Conduct Group.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the average rate of return on manufacturing investment in the (a) United Kingdom and (b) Northern Region in the last five years. [90984]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 13 July 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the rate of return on manufacturing investment.

Rates of return were last published in the ONS First Release, Profitability of UK companies in July 1997, which is available in the House of Commons Library. The estimates for the rate of return on capital employed by manufacturing companies in the United Kingdom were:

1991: 4.3%
1992: 5.1%
1993: 6.2%
1994: 8.0%
1995: 8.8%

The estimates are being up-dated and converted to the definitions in the European System of Accounts, 1995 and the next issue of the First Release is expected to be in November 1999. There are no estimates of rates of return by region.

Employment (City of Durham)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) male and (b) female employees in the City of Durham were in (i) full-time and (ii) part-time employment in (1) temporary and (2) permanent jobs in each year since 1990. [90985]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Kidgell to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 13 July 1999:

In the absence of the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on employment in the City of Durham.

The information is available from two sources. Employee Jobs from the Annual Employment Survey (AES) are shown for the City of Durham Parliamentary Constituency, by gender and full-time/part-time status at September of 1991, 1993, 1995, 1996 and 1997 in the attached table. This Survey was formerly known as the Census of Employment when it was conducted biennially. Figures from the September 1998 AES will be available in January/February 2000.

The second source of information is the Labour Force Survey (LFS). Figures from the LFS are shown for Permanent/Temporary Employees by gender in the table. However this data is only available for the wider area of the County of Durham at 1996, 1997 and 1998.

Both sources of information are not seasonally adjusted.

Business Taxation

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the United Kingdom tax measures under investigation by the EU Code of Conduct Group (Business Taxation) subsequent to its initial list. [91085]

Dawn Primarolo: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave on 14 June 1999, Official Report, columns 30–31.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much landfill tax has been collected for each of the last five years, by each landfill operator. [90523]

Ms Hewitt: Figures relating to the amount of landfill tax collected from each operator cannot be disclosed as to do so would breach commercial confidentiality.

Gold

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations the Treasury held with (a) Bank of England officials, (b) foreign Governments, (c) the World Bank, (d) the International Monetary Fund, (e) the European Central Bank and (f) private institutions on the proposed sale of UK gold reserves prior to the Treasury announcement of 7 May. [88841]

Ms Hewitt: The Treasury regularly consults with outside organisations on a wide range of issues.

Advance Corporation Tax

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to limit the impact on pension funds of the abolition of the advance corporation tax dividend tax credits. [88046]

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on pensions of abolition of the advance corporation tax dividend tax credits. [88047]

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect on pensions of the abolition of the advance corporation tax dividend tax credits. [88028]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 July 1999]: Our package of corporation tax reforms included not only the abolition of payable tax credits, but also a 2–3 per cent. reduction in the rate of corporation tax. The overall effect on pension funds of these changes will vary depending upon factors like the type of scheme and the investment policy adopted. So it is not clear that steps are necessary to limit the impact on pension funds of the abolition of payable tax credits. But during 1997, when tax credits were available for only 6 months, the average British pension fund manager delivered an overall investment return of 16 per cent. and a real return of 12 per cent., which compared very favourably with an average return for the previous year of around 9 per cent.

Overseas Debt

Ms Drown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is (a) the total debt owed to the members of the Paris Club, (b) the total debt that dates from before the cut-off date, (c) the total that is previously rescheduled debt and (d) the remaining eligible debt, broken down for (i) each of the 41 highly indebted poor countries, (ii) Bangladesh, (iii) Cambodia, (iv) the Gambia,

(v) Haiti, (vi) Jamaica, (vii) Morocco, (viii) Nepal, (ix) Nigeria, (x) Peru, (xi) the Philippines and (xii) Zimbabwe. [90319]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested is not available.

Tax Rebates

Mr. Spring: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of tax rebates paid in each financial year since 1992–93 under the arrangements for charitable deeds of covenant. [90253]

Ms Hewitt: Basic rate income tax repayments to charities since 1992–93, and estimates of higher rate tax relief, in respect of donations made under deed of covenant are shown in the table.

	Tax repayment to charities on covenants	Higher rate tax relief on covenants

1994–95	224	25

[2] Provisional

Self-administered Pension Schemes

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the proportion of normal self-administered pension schemes that are liable to pay tax. [90732]

Dawn Primarolo: This information is not held centrally.

Duty-free Goods

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those categories of persons who will retain the right to purchase duty free goods in the European Union. [90395]

Dawn Primarolo: Diplomats accredited to the Court of St. James are entitled to certain privileges and immunities in accordance with the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations 1961. International organisations and their staff who are granted diplomatic status are also entitled to certain privileges and immunities under the International Organisations Act 1968 and the European Communities Act 1972.

UK Payments (EU)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 137, what is his estimate of the difference in cost if UK contributions to the EC budget since 1 January 1999 had been made in euros. [90393]

Ms Hewitt: Over the year as a whole it will be nil.

Debt Relief

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he had at the G8 on the Paris Club debt relief ceiling of 80 per cent; and if he will make a statement. [90504]

Ms Hewitt: The Koln Summit agreed that the ceiling for debt write-down for Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPCs) could be increased to 90 per cent. or more if needed in individual cases, with proportionate burden sharing between creditors.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what actions the Government intend to take to ensure that the Mauritius Mandate target for all eligible countries to have entered the highly indebted poor countries process will be met by 2000. [90506]

Ms Hewitt: The UK has made the Mauritius Mandate target a priority in discussions with fellow creditors and the IFIs. The Koln Summit called for the IFIs and the Paris Club to ensure that three quarters of eligible countries have reached their decision point by the year 2000, and to assist the very poorest countries to embark on the HIPC process as soon as possible.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions there were at the G8 summit on reducing the maximum six-year track record requirement, which must be fulfilled in order to qualify for debt relief under the highly indebted poor countries initiative; and if he will press for an agreement amongst creditor nations to reduce the requirement to a maximum of three years. [90507]

Ms Hewitt: The Koln Summit agreed that the benefits of debt relief should be felt after a maximum of three years rather than the current maximum of six years, and earlier for those countries already in the system.

National Statistics

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the initial and (b) revised quarterly figures for company profits in the national statistics for the last 10 quarters; and what plans he has to review the quality of reporting of company profits in the national statistics. [90932]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 13 July 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on company profits.

Company profits covers the profits of the non-financial corporations sector, including Continental Shelf companies. The available estimates for growth in non-financial company profits are shown in the table below:

	First estimate	Latest estimate
1996
Q3	3.0	3.7
Q4	2.0	0.3
1997
Q1	–0.7	–0.7
Q2	0.9	2.2
Q3	3.7	2.0

	First estimate	Latest estimate
1998
Q1	-1.5	-1.9
Q2	-0.5	0.0
Q3	-0.7	-1.9
Q4	-3.5	Release date 29 July 1999

The first estimate is that published about 12 weeks after the end of the quarter concerned. The first estimates up to and including Q1 1998 were based on definitions of profits based on earlier accounting definitions. The other estimates are based on the European System of Accounts (ESA) 1995. The difference in definition had little effect on the estimates of growth. The latest estimates were those published on 22 March 1999. The initial estimate of company profits for the first quarter of 1999 will be published in the Quarterly National Accounts Press Release, a copy of which will be available in the House of Commons Library, on 29 July.

It is ONS policy to keep the quality of reporting of company profits under continuous review.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the change in service sector productivity over the last four years; and what plans he has to review the quality of estimates for national statistics on service sector productivity. [90931]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 13 July 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on productivity.

Although various published ONS datasets can be used to derive an estimate of productivity for the services sector, there are conceptual differences between these series that still need to be addressed. ONS will wait until a programme of improvements has been introduced and the results quality assured, before publishing official estimates of service sector productivity.

The work programme for the coming months includes new productivity estimates using output and employment data collected on the same basis. We intend to construct a new series will be constructed using hours worked rather than employment numbers as the denominator, and, in the longer term, an index of service sector output and estimates service sector productivity.

Long-term Investment

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the quarter by quarter share of long-term investment in GDP for the least 10 quarters for which figures are available, distinguishing between public and private sector financed long-term investment, and the effect of the private finance initiative. [90930]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 13 July 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on long-term investment.

The ONS does not produce estimates that separate investment into long-term and short-term. It is also not possible to separate investment financed by the private finance initiative within ONS estimates.

For information, the attached table gives the latest published estimates of gross fixed capital formation expressed at current prices in £billion. The total is split between private sector and public sector investment.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91068]

Ms Hewitt: Seven hundred and four of the 2,307 named day questions tabled for answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999 (31 per cent.) were answered substantively on that day. 56 per cent. of all such questions were answered within two days of the nominated day.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the (i) location, (ii) running costs (a) in total and (b) per square metre and (iii) the rental value per square metre of each of his Department's buildings in the last year for which figures are available. [90563]

Dawn Primarolo: The costs below relate to all of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Departments for the 1998–99 financial year.

The total running costs were £340.43 million. This equates to £199 per square metre. The rental value was £93 per square metre.

It has not been possible to provide this information on a building-by-building basis due to the constraints of time and cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Interview Recordings

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to her answer of 12 May 1999, Official Report, columns 170–71, if, in exceptional circumstances, by permission or on request by the interviewees (a) the Independent Commissioner for the Holding Centres, (b) the Chairman of the Independent Commission on Police Complaints, (c) the Police Ombudsman and (d) representatives of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture may have access to an audio recording of an interview conducted in a holding centre. [86136]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 9 June 1999]: The circumstances in which the persons mentioned can have access to audio recordings of police interviews with terrorist suspects in the holding centres are as follows:

(a) There are currently no arrangements in place for the Independent Commissioner for the Holding Centres to gain access to the audio recordings of police interviews with terrorist suspects.

(b) Under the Royal Ulster Constabulary (Complaints, etc.) Regulations 1988, the Independent Commission on Police Complaints is to be supplied with such information and documents as it may reasonably require relating to a complaint or matter referred to it, for the purpose of enabling it to fulfil its functions. This could include listening to audio recordings of police interviews with terrorist suspects if considered relevant to such a complaint or matter.

(c) Provision for a new Police Ombudsman has been made in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998. Once appointed and operational, he or she will take over the functions of the Chairman of the ICPC, and in turn will have access to material (including audio recordings) considered relevant to a particular complaint or matter made or referred to him or her, as the case may be.

(d) The European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, established by virtue of Article 1 of the European Convention of that name, may have access to information which is necessary for the Committee to carry out its task. This would appear to include access to audio recordings if necessary for that purpose. In seeking such access, the Committee is required to have regard to applicable rules of national law and professional ethics.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Petrol Prices

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the amount by which petrol prices would have to rise in order to reduce UK road traffic levels by one per cent. per year, cumulatively for each of the next 15 years. [89364]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government's fuel duty policy is primarily intended to reduce carbon dioxide emissions from road transport, as part of our strategy to tackle climate change. It is, however, also one element of the package of measures we are implementing, following last year's Integrated Transport White Paper, to tackle traffic growth. We will publish our first report under the Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998, on the issue of whether to set a national traffic reduction target, by the end of this year.

Seaforth Dock System

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what responsibilities the Environment Agency has in respect of the dock system at Seaforth and its immediate environs. [90171]

Mr. Meale: The Environment Agency has powers and duties to prevent pollution of controlled waters including the River Mersey and adjoining dock area.

Under Section 85 of the Water Resources Act 1991, it is an offence to cause or knowingly permit any poisonous, noxious or polluting matter or any solid waste matter to enter controlled waters. It is similarly an offence to cause or knowingly permit the discharge of any trade effluent or sewage effluent into controlled waters except in accordance with a relevant consent. The Environment Agency is the enforcing authority.

The Agency has issued Discharge Consent (no. 6992575) for the discharge of treated sewage effluent from a septic tank at Berth S6 of the Container Terminal. The Agency has a duty to inspect the premises and take samples of the discharge on a regular basis to ensure compliance with the consent.

A Waste Management Licence (no. 192–03) is held by the Sheppard Group Ltd, for the storage and treatment of scrap metal at Seaforth Area B. Agency officers are required to inspect licensed sites to ensure that licence conditions are complied with and that the authorised activities are carried out in ways that protect the environment and human health.

Rural Public Transport

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what help is available from his Department to improve public transport in rural areas. [90376]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The aim of our integrated transport strategy is to increase transport choice for all—including those who live in rural areas. In addition to the extra £700 million of funding to assist local authorities with the implementation of their local transport plans, we have made available a further £170 million over three years to improve public transport in rural areas.

The bulk of this £170 million is being used to provide additional bus services in rural areas. We are allocating £32.5 million each year to English local authorities in Rural Bus Subsidy Grant for the support of new rural bus services, as well as making £15 million available for this year's Rural Bus Challenge competition and £15 million for next year's Challenge. We have also set aside £4.2 million a year for the Rural Transport Partnership fund, to assist community-based transport initiatives.

Lancashire was allocated £751,438 in Rural Bus Subsidy Grant for 1998–99, and the same amount for 1999–2000. In addition, the authority was allocated a total of £481,606 for its two successful bids under the 1998 Rural Bus Challenge competition, involving the creation of a new bus and rail interchange facility at Clitheroe and the establishment of a high quality bus corridor to include low floor accessible vehicles, improved shelters, and better provision of information for passengers.

Waste Recycling

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each of the past three years the proportion of waste (a) glass, (b) paper, (c) metal, (d) cloth and (e) biodegradable material that has been recycled in each London borough; what is his estimate for the current year; and what are the boroughs' predictions for 2000–01. [90351]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 12 July 1999]: This information will take some time to put together. I will write to my hon. Friend with the details and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Driving Tests

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many applications were received for (a) driving tests in each of the last 10 years and (b) driving theory tests in each year since their introduction. [90593]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The number of applications for all categories of practical tests for the financial years 1989–90 to 1998–99, and for the theory tests for the years 1996–97 to 1998–99 are as follows:

Year	Number of applications for Practical tests	Theory tests
1989–90	2,056,271	—
1990–91	2,076,211	—
1991–92	1,942,421	—
1992–93	1,756,152	—
1993–94	1,731,115	—
1994–95	1,720,373	—
1995–96	1,871,351	—
1996–97	1,608,438	1,231,186
1997–98	1,380,491	1,237,709
1998–99	1,460,832	1,220,514

Water Prices Review

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the likely impact on domestic and business water users from 2000 to 2005 of the periodic review of water prices to set prices for that period. [91163]

Mr. Meale: Under the Water Industry Act 1991, the regulation of water and sewerage undertakers' price limits is for the Director General of Water Services. In setting price limits, the Director General is also under a duty to ensure that the interests of customers are protected, and he will therefore have regard to the impact of the periodic review on customers.

We believe that reductions in average water and sewerage bills can be secured. The Director General expects to announce draft price limits for each undertaker later this month.

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance he has given to the Director General of Ofwat concerning the periodic review of water prices to set prices for the period from April 2000 to 2005. [91162]

Mr. Meale: Under the Water Industry Act 1991 the regulation of water and sewerage undertakers' price limits is for the Director General of Water Services. The Government have given guidance to the Director General on the environmental and water quality improvements to be delivered by 2005. This guidance was published under the title "Raising the Quality" in September 1998, and was supported by more detailed announcements of company programmes on 1 March 1999.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the current situation is in respect of providing a Channel Tunnel rail interchange at Stratford, East London, to serve East Anglia. [90708]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A new international and domestic station at Stratford remains integral to the Channel Tunnel Rail Link project, with construction planned as part of Section 2. The Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996 provides powers for an open box over which the station is to be built. An Order providing powers for the station itself has been sought by London and Continental Railways (LCR) under the Transport and Works Act 1992. Following a public inquiry, the Secretary of State announced on 8 September 1998 that he was minded to approve the Order with modifications. But before reaching a final decision he required further information from LCR and other parties on pedestrian access, which is presently awaited.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions whom he plans to consult before approving draft Regional Development Agency strategies. [91050]

Mr. Meale: The Regional Development Agencies are currently drafting their regional strategies which will be issued for public consultation over the summer. They intend to submit their strategies to Ministers in late October. There is no formal approval process but we aim to respond to the strategies by the end of the year.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the actual and planned Government expenditure on the home energy efficiency scheme in each of the years from 1990–91 to 2001–02. [91475]

Mr. Meale: The total expenditure on the Government's Home Energy Efficiency Scheme (HEES) in each year from the start of the scheme in 1991 is as follows.

£ million

Year	Expenditure
1990–91[1]	1.5
1991–92	26.1
1992–93	33.6
1993–94	41.5
1994–95	83
1995–96	107.2
1996–97	76.1
1997–98	76.1
1998–99	76.2
1999–2000[2]	76.1
2000–01[3] allocated new HEES	125.0
2001–02[3] allocated new HEES	175.0

[1] Expenditure in 1990–91 was for 3 months only.
[2] Estimated
[3] The Government have allocated a total of £300 million over 2000–01 and 2001–02 to tackling fuel poverty through energy efficiency improvements. Since this is a devolved function, the most appropriate method of dividing the moneys between the proposed New Home Energy Efficiency Scheme (HEES) in England and the separate programmes in Scotland and Wales will be considered shortly, taking account of the extent of fuel poverty in each.

Voluntary and Community Transport

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the report commissioned by his Department on voluntary and community transport. [91548]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The report is being published today and copies of both the summary and full report will be placed in the Library of the House.

The report contains a wide range of detailed information about the valuable role of voluntary and community transport operators and I very much welcome it as a focus for debate by all those involved in the funding and operation of this important area of transport.

We will be circulating the report to all stakeholders in this area and inviting comment from them on its findings and recommendations.

Outdoor Advertisements

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to improve the arrangements for control of outdoor advertisements. [91549]

Mr. Raynsford: I have today issued a consultation paper with proposals to update, clarify and improve the arrangements for controlling outdoor advertisements. Comments are invited no later than Thursday 14 October 1999.

The amendments which are proposed as part of the Government's drive to modernise the planning system also seek to make the current system more responsive to the rapidly changing nature of outdoor advertising. They would benefit business without spoiling the appearance of our towns and cities.

Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Library.

Rights of Way

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish proposals for improving the rights of way system in England and Wales. [91759]

Mr. Meacher: I shall be publishing a consultation paper tomorrow setting out the Government's proposals for improving the rights of way system as part of legislation to provide a statutory right of access to open countryside for people on foot. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Sex Equality Legislation

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the Equal Opportunities Commission's proposals for changes to the sex equality legislation. [91643]

Ms Hodge: We have today placed in the Library copies of the Government's response on some of the issues addressed by the EOC in their proposals for changes to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Equal Pay Acts. In reaching our conclusions, the Government have taken into account the Better Regulation Task Force's report on anti-discrimination legislation and the Commission for Racial Equality's proposals for changes to the Race Relations Act 1976, on which we are also responding today.

In considering the EOC's proposals, our guiding principle has been to identify measures that will have the greatest practical impact on the lives of men and women. We will therefore: consult on changes in the way equal pay cases are dealt with to make them clearer and simpler; update the law to take account of developments in Europe on equal treatment; bring the functions of all public authorities within the scope of the Sex Discrimination Act; explore both legislative and non-legislative options to ensure public bodies promote equal opportunities between women and men; encourage the EOC to work with equality bodies and others to help employers and service providers meet their obligations under the current law by producing clear and accessible guidance and examples of good practice; and bring the EOC's powers in line with the Disability Rights Commission. At this stage we do not consider that undertaking a major legislative overhaul, in the way the EOC suggests, will of itself achieve the practical changes that are needed.

The Government are taking concrete steps to tackle key issues that affect women and men's lives. For example, the National Childcare Strategy created over 65,000 new child care places last year, enabling men and women to choose to work or study. The National Minimum Wage is benefiting women in particular, as they make up the highest proportion of those on low pay. Measures under the Employment Relations Bill on maternity and parental leave will help people to balance their working and home lives.

Kosovo Refugees

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to review the EMAG arrangements for those local authorities which have taken on significant responsibility for the education of the children of refugees from Kosovo; and if he will make a statement. [90788]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We are grateful for the positive way Local Authorities have responded in providing for the needs of evacuees from Kosovo and for securing school places for the children concerned. A meeting has been arranged on 20 July between the Local Government Association, the Home Office and other interested parties to discuss the costs incurred by Local Authorities.

The Department's Ethnic Minority Achievement Grant is able to provide specialist support for refugee education. However, all allocations of the Grant for 1999–2000 were announced on 4 March, and we have no present plans to review these.

Statutory Instruments

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of statutory instruments introduced by his Department into Parliament in (a) 1998, (b) 1992, (c) 1985 and (d) 1973 had the European Union as their legislative source. [89162]

Mr. Mudie: The total number of all Statutory Instruments (SIs) registered as General Instruments in 1998, 1992, 1985 and 1973 are shown in the following table.

Year	Number of SIs
1998	1,565
1992	1,692
1985	1,204
1973	1,260

Source:
Statutory Publications Unit, Stationery Office: Statutory Instruments are classified as General Instruments if they are in the nature of a General Public Act. SIs may also be registered as Local Instruments in the nature of local or private Acts. SIs implementing EC legislation will always be classified as General Instruments.

It is not possible, without incurring disproportionate cost, to determine how many of these SIs were introduced to comply with European Community obligations.

New Deal

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of participants in the New Deal programme have left it to become self-employed. [89430]

Mr. Andrew Smith: People who move off New Deal to start self-employment are recorded as having found work, and separate statistics are not collected. However, 2,635 young people have started on the Basic Awareness Session of the Self-Employment Route of the New Deal Employment Option; and 740 have started on the Test Trading stage. It is too early to provide meaningful figures of those who have subsequently moved from this stage into independent self-employment, but these will be available from later this year.

"Learning to Succeed"

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the implications of his paper, "Learning to Succeed", Cm 4392, for community organisations that currently use the money they generate from training contracts via TECs to cross-subsidise community-based activities; and what steps he will take to ensure the use of community activities to increase access to education and training for Asian women and Asian Elders. [90357]

Mr. Mudie: "Learning to Succeed" makes clear that adult and community learning is a vital part of the Government's aim to create access to high quality, relevant learning opportunities for everyone. The new Learning and Skills Council will provide an opportunity to integrate adult and community learning provision more effectively with other learning opportunities. To this end, the Government propose to give the Council a national duty to arrange adequate and sufficient adult and community learning provision and to give to local authorities the changed duty to contribute to arrangements for provision at local level. The Council will develop a new funding system that caters for the needs of all post-16 learners, including those in adult and community education. Local Learning Councils will arrange provision in the light of plans drawn up by local Learning Partnerships. These new coherent arrangements should make it easier for individuals from all groups in the community to access a wide range of learning opportunities. We shall consult further on the detailed arrangements.

Ethnic Community Teachers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action his Department has taken to encourage people from ethnic communities to enter the teaching profession; and if he will make a statement. [90440]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Teacher Training Agency (TTA) published a new Corporate Plan for 1999–2002 on 6 July. This makes promoting the recruitment of teachers the Agency's top priority. The Plan includes an aim to increase the recruitment of members of ethnic minorities to initial teacher training (ITT) from the present 6 per cent. to 9 per cent.

The Agency has also persuaded the vast majority of providers to introduce an additional voluntary target for recruitment from the ethnic minorities. The average voluntary target for all primary and secondary ITT providers is 7 per cent. The TTA also allocates additional places to ITT providers if they achieve exceptional recruitment of ethnic minority trainees.

Pre-school Education

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures the Government are taking to encourage the expansion of pre-school education. [90368]

Ms Hodge: We already fund three terms of free nursery education places for all four year olds whose parents want it. Over the next three years, we are making available £390 million to fund free early education places for three year olds. By April 2002, the participation rate of three year olds will be very nearly doubled to 66 per cent. In 1999–2000, about £40 million of this additional funding will be allocated to the 57 Local Education Authorities with the highest levels of social need, creating around 48,000 places. From April 2000, Funding will be distributed across all Local Education Authorities.

Age Diversity

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money has been spent on (a) producing and (b) promoting the Code of Practice on Age Diversity in Employment. [90705]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The initial consultation on the draft Code cost around £22,000. This includes the cost of designing, printing and distributing 21,000 copies of the consultation document and carrying out the consultation exercise.

Costs for the final version of the Code amount to £100,000. This includes the costs for printing and distribution of 35,000 initial packs of the Code and guidance, the production of publicity fliers and posters for display in Jobcentres, libraries and Citizens Advice Bureaux: and initial advertising in human resource journals. Beyond this, an additional £70,000 has already been committed to support initiatives by partners to take the Code forward with employers.

We are currently assessing the initial impact of the launch of the Code last month and will be developing a forward strategy to raise awareness and support employers who want to implement the principles of the Code.

I hope to make an announcement about the next phase of the Code's development in the autumn.

School Capital Investment (Stoke-on-Trent)

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what capital investment in schools in Stoke-on-Trent has taken place in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c)1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000 to date; and what the planned levels are for the next two years. [90785]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is shown in the following tables. Table A shows the capital investment the Government have made in schools in Stoke-on-Trent in the four years up to 1999–2000. Table B shows the level of investment the Government intend to make for the following two financial years, provided resources allow; this represents only commitments arising from existing projects; we cannot indicate what investment we will make to Stoke in respect of new projects. In 1996–97, Stoke was still part of Staffordshire; it is not possible to determine how much of the grant and credit approval allocated to Staffordshire LEA actually benefited schools in Stoke.

Table A: Expenditure in each year and the amount of government support

1996–97 and 1997–98: Annual Capital Guidelines, Supplementary Credit Approval, and VA grant: For 1996–97, Stoke was part of Staffordshire; it is not possible to disaggregate what credit approvals and grants would have benefited Stoke schools. New Deal for Schools, Reduction in Class Sizes, National Grid for Learning, and Security in Schools: None of these initiatives were running in 1996–97; nor, in 1997–98, were the initiatives for Class Sizes and the National Grid for Learning operational.

[2] LEA's Education Capital Programme: Please note, the total education programme is less than the sum total of the amounts allocated under government initiatives. This is because LEAs are not obliged to use credit approvals for the purposes for which they were allocated (see notes 3 and 4); also some of the grants are used for revenue purposes (see note 7).

[3] Education Capital Programme 1998–99: Please note, this figure is provisional only, based on estimates by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

[4] Annual Capital Guidelines: This is used in the calculation of the LEA's Basic Credit Approval (BCA), where the LEA's capital receipts are taken into account. Just because a project has been taken account of in calculating the ACG, it does not mean that the LEA has to use its BCA for that purpose.

[5] Supplementary Credit Approval (SCA): Unlike BCA, receipts are not taken into account when calculating the level of SCA. However, unless the SCA specifically says otherwise, the LEA is not obliged to use the SCA for the purpose for which it was allocated.

[6] New Deal for Schools: Some of the grant figures for VA schools would have changed slightly in order to reflect the actual costs of the project.

[7] National Grid for Learning and Security in Schools: While the majority of the expenditure supported by the grant will be capital in nature, some will be revenue, and it is not possible to isolate the two elements.

[8] VA Grant: Capital grant is paid in respect of Governors' liability at a rate of 85 per cent. Actual amount of grant paid may change depending on the costs of project on tender.

Note:
In addition to all this, PFI Credits of up to £75 million have been allocated to support Stoke on Trent's PFI scheme to repair and maintain all maintained schools within the LEA. Stoke anticipate signing a contract by the end of this calendar year.

International Labour Conference

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which Minister attended the 1999 ILO general conference; and on what days. [91139]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I attended and addressed the 87th Session of the International Labour Conference on 8 June 1999.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91059]

Mr. Mudie: Between 1 May 1997 and 14 April 1999, 2,026 parliamentary questions have been tabled to the Department for written answer on a named day; 75 per cent. received a substantive reply on that day.

Home Tuition

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has issued to local education authorities on the provision of home tuition for children suffering post-traumatic stress as a result of bullying at school; and if he will make a statement. [90758]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We issued on 8 July to all local education authorities Circular 11/99, "Social Inclusion: the LEA role in Pupil Support". This offers advice, among other things, on arranging education for children out of school for any reason, including post-traumatic stress as a result of bullying.

School Exclusions (Drugs)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children have been excluded from schools as a result of possession or supply of controlled drugs on school premises in each of the last five years. [91134]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not currently collected centrally. However, the Department will begin collecting this information in the autumn, for the current school year, 1998–99, as part of the Government's 10-year UK Anti-Drugs Strategy.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance has been given by his Department to headteachers regarding the exclusion of pupils found (a) in possession of and (b) supplying controlled drugs while on school premises. [91131]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Circular 10/99, "Social Inclusion: Pupil Support", which was issued on 8 July this year, addresses these issues.

New Deal (Private Sector Companies)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what criteria will be used by his Department in assessing the performance of private sector companies delivering the New Deal. [91206]

Mr. Andrew Smith: There are three main criteria on which I will base my assessment of the performance of private sector companies leading New Deal. Day to day performance is regularly reviewed against the individual delivery contracts; comparative performance between Units of Delivery is measured by the published core performance measures and the evaluation of New Deal will assess the effectiveness of different contracting strategies.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Kosovar Refugees

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects Kosovar Albanians who came to the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme to return to Kosovo. [91007]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Kosovar Albanians who came to the United Kingdom under the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme (HEP) were granted leave to enter in line with close family members already settled in the United Kingdom or granted exceptional leave to enter for 12 months to provide them with temporary shelter as requested by the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in his announcement about the change of policy to the HEP and the consideration of asylum applications from citizens of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) on 15 June, stated that no Kosovar Albanian would have their stay curtailed nor would they be required to leave the United Kingdom until it was safe to do so.

It is our intention to facilitate the return of any Kosovar Albanians who wish to return to Kosovo as soon as possible. In co-operation with voluntary organisations in the refugee sector, the British Red Cross, UNHCR and the International Organisation for Migration, we will be providing a voluntary return programme. We expect the first flight to take place in the week commencing 19 July. For those without passports, the necessary travel documentation will be provided for those on the return programme. The programme will be available to those FRY citizens from Kosovo who arrived on the HEP as well as those who arrived in the United Kingdom independently.

Prisons

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a system of sanctions and rewards based on performance for public sector prisons, as considered by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons in his 1999 report on HMP Wormwood Scrubs; and if he will make a statement. [90582]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service already operates a system of performance-related pay for senior staff, which includes the governors of public sector prisons. In addition, the Prison Service has started to trial service delivery agreements which set clear targets for public sector prisons to deliver, both in terms of quantity and quality. These targets will translate into staff performance plans. A specific project has been established to explore further options to reward good, and sanction substandard, performance.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his estimate of the extra capacity which will be added to existing prisons in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement; [90584]

(2) what is his estimate of the number of new prisons which will be built in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [90596]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service is building four additional prisons over the next three financial years. In 1999–2000, two new prisons are due to open. Forest Bank, near Salford, will provide 800 places and Ashfield, near Bristol, will provide 400 places. In 2000–01, a new prison will open at Onley, Rugby, which will provide 600 places. In 2001–02, a new prison at Marchington, Staffordshire, will open providing 800 places. Subject to legal agreements, the Prison Service also has outline planning permission for two further new prisons at Peterborough and Ashford (Staines) and an application for a new prison at Maghull in Merseyside is awaiting determination by the local planning authority. No decision has yet been taken on the start dates.

The Prison Service is also providing an additional 1,100 new places at existing prisons in 1999–2000. No decision has been taken to build extra capacity at existing prisons beyond this period.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to change procedures in his Department which relate to responding to details of serious problems in Prison Service establishments, with particular reference to those which are made in reports by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons; and if he will make a statement. [90583]

Mr. George Howarth: Responses to the reports and recommendations of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons are managed through a specific protocol which was introduced in November 1997. This requires a full response and action plan to be drawn up within 30 days of the publication of the report and updated at nine and 15 months afterwards. The original and updated action plan is sent to Ministers and to the Chief Inspector.

The protocol was not applied retrospectively. It is currently under review.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action has been taken by Prison Service managers in response to the finding in Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons 1999 report on HMP Wormwood Scrubs that cell call alarms had been muted on A Wing in the prison; and if he will make a statement. [90588]

Mr. George Howarth: A governor's order was issued immediately after Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons' inspection which required managers to make regular checks on the system. The checks include both random and regular visual checks of alarm panels in wing offices. Staff have also been briefed directly by the governor and reminded of their personal responsibilities to respond to cell alarms. Notices to prisoners have been published and displayed on wing notice boards reminding prisoners that cell call systems are for emergency use only.

The broken mute switch referred to in the Chief Inspector's report has been repaired and the cell call system is now in full working order on A Wing.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those Prison Service establishments which are currently under special managerial attention; how long they are expected to remain under special managerial attention; and if he will make a statement. [90585]

Mr. George Howarth: The following Prison Service establishments are currently listed as requiring closer managerial attention:

Brockhill

Bullwood Hall

Chelmsford

Feltham

Glen Parva

Holloway

Parc

Wellingborough

Wormwood Scrubs.

All establishments are kept under review and no dates have been set for their removal.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the Prison Service's current projections for changes in the prison population in each of the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [90597]

Mr. George Howarth: The Research Development and Statistics Directorate of the Home Office provided revised projections of the prison population in England and Wales in May, and a summary of the projection is included in the April 1999 'Prison Population Brief' which is available on the Internet at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/index.htm

Projections are provided according to various alternative scenarios. The middle variant projection assumes that Crown Court custody rates increase at 0.6 per cent. for males and 1.1 per cent. for females, and that sentence lengths increase by 0.2 months per year in the first two years (but by no more thereafter). A higher variant assumes that from 2001, in addition to the custody rate increases assumed in the middle variant, sentence lengths continue to increase after the first two years at 1.5 per cent. per annum for males and 2 per cent. per annum for females. The results are as given in the table.

These scenarios both assume that the amount of courts' business remains constant over the period. A third scenario, that sentence lengths and custody rates do not increase further, leads to a prison population of 67,400 by 2006. Projections take into account known legislative and policy changes.

Long term projections of male and female prisoners, projected through to 2006, England and Wales

	1999	2000	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006
Higher variant: Total	64,900	67,000	68,800	70,000	70,800	72,000	73,500	75,000
Male	61,600	63,200	64,800	65,900	66,600	67,700	69,200	70,600
Female	3,300	3,800	4,000	4,100	4,200	4,300	4,300	4,400
Middle variant: Total	64,800	66,500	68,100	68,800	69,200	69,700	70,200	70,900
Male	61,600	62,900	64,300	64,800	65,200	65,600	66,100	66,700
Female	3,300	3,600	3,800	4,000	4,000	4,100	4,100	4,200

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps the Prison Service takes to monitor prisoners who are transferred from private to public prisons, with particular reference to the honouring of risk assessments conducted in private prisons. [90988]

Mr. George Howarth: Risk assessments on prisoners are prepared at prisons for a variety of purposes, including categorisation, sentence planning, release on temporary licence and home detention curfew. Contracted out prisons are subject to the same rules, procedures, guidance and policy for risk assessments as public sector prisons. Assessment processes at contracted out and public sector prisons are monitored during standards audits. Where prisoners transfer, the assessment will be the responsibility of the prison with final accountability for the decision in question, but in doing so, it would normally be expected to take into account any previous assessment undertaken by other prisons. Prisoners dissatisfied with decisions at contracted out or public sector prisons can make use of the request and complaints procedures.

Wormwood Scrubs

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 28 June 1999, Official Report, column 28, on Wormwood Scrubs, on what date he asked Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons to re-inspect HMP Wormwood Scrubs within six months of the publication of the 1999 report on the prison. [90710]

Mr. George Howarth: The Chief Inspector indicated in the preface to his report his intention to return to Wormwood Scrubs in six months' time. The formal request made by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for him to do so was effective from the date of his statement to the House.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he and other Ministers in his Department have met representatives of the Prison Service to discuss the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on HMP Wormwood Scrubs published in 1997; and if he will make a statement. [90581]

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the Minister with responsibility for prisons, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams—and, until July 1998, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin)—hold regular meetings with the Director General of the Prison Service in addition to quarterly performance meetings to discuss the Prison Service's quarterly performance reports. Issues arising from the reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons are discussed at these meetings as appropriate. My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams also has regular meetings with other senior Prison Service officials and chairs the Prison Service Strategy Board which meets eight times a year.

Prisons (Hepatitis C)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the percentage of the prison population with hepatitis C; and what (a) preventive measures are taken against and (b) treatment is available for hepatitis C in the Prison Service. [90425]

Mr. George Howarth: A voluntary, anonymous survey of HIV and hepatitis and risk behaviour was conducted in 1997–98 by the Public Health Laboratory Service at eight prisons. The survey found prevalence of hepatitis C to be 7.4 per cent. of the prison population overall.

The Prison Service has a strategy for preventing the spread of communicable diseases which covers training, education, prevention, risk reduction and harm minimisation. A pilot project on the provision of disinfecting tablets to reduce the risk of spreading hepatitis C through prisoners sharing injecting equipment has recently been completed. The Prison Service hopes to be able to extend this initiative across the remainder of the prison estate during the coming year. Advice and guidance is sent to prison governors and doctors on an ad hoc basis and covers the management of blood-borne viruses including hepatitis C. Every prison is expected to have a communicable diseases management team to deal strategically with the management, medical and social challenges involved.

The treatment available for prisoners with hepatitis C follows that provided to members of the general public by the NHS with decisions about initiating further investigations and treatment taken only by specialists.

Prison Service (Litigation)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will conduct a further study of the use by convicted criminals of small claims court procedures to take actions against the Prison Service. [91075]

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has asked the Prison Service to conduct an assessment of the extent of litigation of all types by serving prisoners and to report to him by the end of July. We will decide whether any further study is necessary in the light of the results of this work.

Citizenship Applicants

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to determine whether an applicant for citizenship is a political extremist. [90982]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There are no such criteria. "Political extremism" is not a matter which is included in the guidance to staff on the good character requirement.

Race Relations Act (Review)

Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the Government's response to the Commission for Racial Equality's Third Review of the Race Relations Act 1976. [91696]

Mr. Straw: I have today placed in the Library, a copy of the Government's response to the Commission for Racial Equality's Third Review of the Race Relations Act 1976. In deciding their response, the Government have taken into account the Better Regulation Task Force's report on anti-discrimination legislation and the Equal Opportunities Commission's proposals for updating the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 to which we are also responding today.

The Government recognise that although significant progress has been made since the Race Relations Act 1976 was introduced 23 years ago, there is much to be done before we achieve a truly inclusive society. Institutional racism, as highlighted by the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry report, has to be tackled in a number of ways, of which the legislative framework is only one.

The Government want the public sector to set the pace and lead by example. This approach is reflected in our response.

Prisons-probation Panel

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on the appointment of a joint prisons-probation panel to accredit the design and delivery of work with offenders designed to reduce re-offending. [91697]

Mr. Straw: The following independent experts have been appointed to the Panel:

Panel members
Mrs. Hilary Eldridge	Director, Lucy Faithfull Foundation
Dr. Dawn Fisher	Consultant Forensic Clinical Psychologist, Llanarth Court Psychiatric Hospital
Professor Don Grubin	Professor of Forensic Psychiatry, University of Newcastle upon Tyne
Dr. Moira Hamlin	Clinical Psychologist formerly with University of Bristol Health Trust
Dr. Norman Hoffman	Senior Adviser, Abt Associates Inc, Cambridge Massachusetts
Dr. Doug Lipton	Senior Research Fellow, National Development and Research Institutes Inc., New York
Professor Mike Maguire	Professor of Criminology & Criminal Justice, Cardiff University
Dr. Jancie Marques	Chief of Programme Development & Evaluation, California Department of Mental Health
Dr. William Murphy	Professor of Psychiatry, University of Tennessee
Dr. Frank Porporino	Senior Partner, T3 Associates, Ottawa, Canada
Professor Peter Raynor	Professor of Applied Social Studies, University of Wales, Swansea
Mr. Simon Shepherd	Clinical Psychologist and Chief Executive, European Association for the treatment of Addiction

The Panel will also include nominated representatives of the Home Office, the Prison Service, the Association of Chief Officers of Probation, and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Probation.

The Panel will, under the Chairmanship of Sir Duncan Nichol, start work later this year.

Metropolitan Police Committee

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the latest Annual Report and Annual Plan of the Metropolitan Police Committee; and if he will make a statement. [91698]

Mr. Straw: The Annual Report of the Metropolitan Police Committee for 1998–99, and the Annual Plan of the Committee for 1999–2000, are being published today.

The Report gives information about the advice and other work which the Committee have undertaken for the past financial year. The Plan sets out the work which the Committee aims to undertake on tasks which we have agreed that it will undertake, again to support me in my role as Police Authority in the current financial year. A major task is to help prepare for the Metropolitan Police Authority, planned for July next year.

Copies of the Report and Plan are being placed in the Library. The Chairman of the Committee is writing with copies to a wide range of interested people and organisations, including all Members with London constituencies, all Members of the European Parliament whose constituencies include London areas, all London Boroughs, all Police Community Consultative Groups and all Lay Visitor Panels.

I am grateful to Sir John Quinton, the Chairman of the Committee and all his colleagues for their advice and other assistance to me, and look forward in particular to working with them on the transition to the new arrangements for the governance of London's policing.

Drug-related Crime

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the action he is taking to tackle drug-related crime. [91699]

Mr. Straw: I made an announcement earlier today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 332, what decision he has reached on whether there is a need to suspend, under the powers granted by section 13 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, the certificate of designation held by Harlan UK Ltd. [91709]

Mr. George Howarth: Based on advice received from the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate, I am satisfied that there are no grounds under section 13 of the Act to suspend the certificate of designation.

While the investigation into the allegations made against this establishment continues, it would be inappropriate for me to comment further at this stage.

Freedom of Information Bill

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the respects in which the proposals within the draft Freedom of Information Bill represent an increased restriction on access to information. [90719]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 13 July 1999]: There are no proposals in the draft Bill which represent an increased restriction on access to information.

WALES

Deeside

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on objective 2 status for Deeside. [89670]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 2 July 1999]: New objective 2 areas will not be known for some time. The Government must first submit proposals to the European Commission for their approval. The Government have recently consulted widely on what our priorities should be. The National Assembly for Wales is fully involved in discussions.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on assisted area status and its effects on Deeside. [89671]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 2 July 1999]: We have today announced our proposals for new assisted areas to operate from 1 January 2000. The proposals have been submitted to the European Commission, which must now agree the final areas. I am confident that our proposal represents a good deal for Wales, with 71.5 per cent. population coverage, and a good deal for Deeside, as can be seen from the proposals which I have today copied to all Welsh MPs and MEPs.

Higher Education

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of university and higher education entrants from each county in Wales in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [89940]

Mr. Hain: The number of entrants to higher education courses at Higher Education Institution in Wales from each county in Wales for the academic year 1998–99, is provided in the following table. Data for 1999–2000 are not yet available.

Further and higher education funding is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Jay Abatan

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Attorney-General if he and the CPS will meet the hon. Member for Worthing, West in connection with the fatal attack in Brighton on Mr. Jay Abatan. [90748]

The Attorney-General: Criminal proceedings are currently being brought against two defendants following the incident which resulted in the death of Mr. Jay Abatan. So long as these matters remain sub judice it would not be proper for me, the Chief Crown Prosecutor, or his staff, to discuss the case with either the hon. Member, or his constituent who is a vital witness in the case. I understand that the Chief Crown Prosecutor for Sussex will be pleased to meet the hon. Member or his constituent when the case has been completed.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Millennium Compliance

Jacqui Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress being made by United Kingdom offshore oil and gas producers and oil companies to deal with the millennium bug. [91663]

Mr. Byers: DTI continues to fulfil the role of "responsible body" reporting to the Action 2000 National Infrastructure Forum on the preparations being made by the oil industry and UK's offshore oil and gas producers to avoid any disruption due to the Year 2000 threat to computer systems.

At the National Infrastructure Forum meeting in January 1999, the industry attracted an overall "amber" assessment against the standard colour code adopted by Action 2000. I am pleased to report that WS Atkins Consultants Ltd. have confirmed that the industry continues to make substantial progress both onshore and offshore.

In detail WS Atkins found that over 80 per cent. of the industry now merit a blue assessment (no identified risks of material disruption), and that the remainder are on track to attain that rating once work scheduled during the normal summer shutdown period has been completed, and that residual contingency planning and external dependency issues had been finalised.

The DTI has arranged for WS Atkins to carry out a further review at the end of September, to monitor progress on those outstanding issues and carry out a further programme of independent check visits to confirm that the scheduled work has been completed successfully. DTI will report on this work at the National Infrastructure Forum meeting in October 1999, and will continue to monitor the industry's progress throughout the millennium period.

A summary of their report has been placed in the Libraries of the House, and copies have been made available on the DTI internet site.

EC Voice Telephony Directive

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out the progress that has been made in implementing Article 8 of the EC Revised Voice Telephony Directive. [90789]

Mr. Wills: Article 8 of the Revised Voice Telephony Directive (RVTD) requires member states to take specific measures where appropriate to ensure equal access to, and affordability of, fixed public telephone services, including directory services for disabled users and users with special social needs. Regulations implementing Article 8 were made in 1998 (The Telecommunications (Open Network Provision) (Voice Telephony) Regulations 1998).

Following a consultation exercise in 1998, Oftel has proposed further specific measures to improve access to telecommunications for the disabled. The Government are planning to consult on the detail of these proposals later this year.

Industrial Development Advisory Boards

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the arrangements are for remunerating the members of Industrial Development Advisory Boards for expenses that arise in the exercise of their duties. [90659]

Mr. Wills: Members of the Industrial Development Advisory Board and the Regional Industrial Development Boards are entitled to claim travel and subsistence expenses incurred in attending Board meetings or on visits on behalf of the Board. Expenses are reimbursed at the rates applicable to senior civil servants.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the policy of his Department is on decisions taken by members of the Industrial Development Advisory Boards which do not reflect the priorities of his Department. [90665]

Mr. Wills: The Regional Industrial Development Boards are kept informed of the Departments priorities, eg as most recently set out in the Competitiveness White Paper (Cmnd. 4176). My colleagues and I consider carefully the advice of the Regional Industrial Development Boards before reaching our decisions on regional selective assistance applications.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what procedures his Department follows to ensure that conflicts of interest cannot arise in the case of the (a) members of the Industrial Development Advisory Boards and (b) those who advise them. [90666]

Mr. Wills: In the case of members of the Industrial Development Advisory Board and the Regional Industrial Development Boards, guidance from the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments is followed to ensure that any potential conflict of interest is recognised.

Officials who advise Board members are bound by the Civil Service Code which states that civil servants should not misuse their official position or information acquired in the course of their official duties to further their private interests or those of others.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will amend the membership criteria of the Industrial Development Advisory Boards to include representatives of elected bodies, trade union organisations and sub-regional development organisations. [90657]

Mr. Wills: The Industrial Development Advisory Board is appointed under Section 10 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. By virtue of Section 10(3) of the Act, the Board is to include

> "persons who appear to the Secretary of State to have wide experience of, and to have shown capacity in, industry, banking, accounting and finance".

The Chairman and members of the Regional Industrial Development Boards (RIDBs) are selected for their regional knowledge of industry and commerce. I have made it clear that the RIDBs should take account of the strategic economic focus which is being provided by the new Regional Development Agencies in giving their advice on regional selective assistance cases.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidance he has given the Industrial Development Advisory Boards on responding to approaches from hon. Members prior to the consideration of applications for regional selective assistance. [90667]

Mr. Wills: Hon. Members should approach my colleagues and me on issues which they consider relevant to an application for regional selective assistance.

North West Industrial Development Board

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the members of the North West Industrial Development Board and the dates of their appointment; [90660]

(2) when he next intends to announce an appointment to the North West Industrial Development Board. [90651]

Mr. Wills: The members of the North West Industrial Development Board and the dates of their appointment are as follows:

Members	Date of appointment
Mr. Raymond Armstrong	1 January 1999
Mrs. Lorraine Clinton	1 May 1998
Mrs. Christine Coates	1 January 1993
Mr. John Dixon	1 August 1997
Mr. John Hancock	29 March 1995
Mr. David McCall	1 August 1997
Mr. Kirit Pathak	1 January 1999
Mr. Anthony Pilkington	1 January 1994
Mr. Anil Ruia	1 January 1994
Mr. Anthony Strachan	1 August 1998

At the present time, there are no definite dates for the announcement of further appointments to the Committee.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the persons who have attended each of the last 12 meetings of the North West Industrial Development Board when applications for regional selective assistance have been under discussion. [90661]

Mr. Wills: The attendees of the last 12 meetings of the North West Industrial Development Board are listed on the table. Please note that meetings were not held in October or November 1998.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what guidance he gives to members of the North West Industrial Development Board on the exercise of their responsibilities on behalf of the Secretary of State; [90662]

(2) what guidelines he has given to members of the North West Industrial Development Board on the policy of his Department towards the allocation of regional selective assistance to areas of high unemployment in the North West of England. [90664]

Mr. Wills: Members of the North West Industrial Development Board, the other Regional Industrial Development Boards and the Industrial Development Advisory Board give advice to Ministers from a commercial perspective on higher value RSA cases, within the RSA Scheme criteria.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions in each of the last five years decisions taken by the North West

Industrial Development Board have been subject to amendment by the Secretary of State under the Industrial Development Act 1982. [90663]

Mr. Wills: There has been one such occasion.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by name of recipient all allocations of regional selective assistance in the last five years to organisations in the North West of England, the value of the assistance and the date of the allocation, in development and intermediate areas separately. [90668]

Mr. Wills: As the list requested runs to some 900 companies, I will write to my hon. Friend and place a copy of that letter in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what circumstances pressures from competitors on UK commercial undertakings can be taken into account by the members of industrial development advisory committees or those advising them when considering applications for regional selective assistance. [90652]

Mr. Wills: Applicants are only eligible for regional selective assistance if they are making new investments. As well as the viability of the project, competition and job displacement are factors taken into account when considering applications.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what statistics are collected by his Department in respect of rejections of applications for regional selective assistance which lead to the cancellation of the proposed investment projects and a consequential loss of potential jobs. [90653]

Mr. Wills: The Department keeps a record of all regional selective assistance applications. It is not part of the scheme procedures, however, to continue contacts with unsuccessful applicants, and subsequent developments are not, therefore, routinely recorded.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the number of jobs or potential jobs lost as a result of refusals of applications for regional selective assistance which have led to the cancellation of the proposed investment in each of the last three years. [90654]

Mr. Wills: No estimate has been made. It is reasonable to assume, however, that the figure would be small. Within available funds, the Department gives a sympathetic hearing to any eligible application and the main reasons for rejection are either on grounds that a project will proceed in any event without grant or that a project is not viable and would not, therefore, provide sustainable jobs.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the cost of regional selective assistance per job created in the North West of England in the last five years. [90655]

Mr. Wills: The average cost per job resulting from Regional Selective Assistance offers accepted in the North West over the last five years is £4,019.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions in the last five years members of the North West Industrial Development Advisory Committee or those who advise them have had to stand aside from the consideration of regional selective assistance applications for reasons of either personal or professional conflict of interest. [90656]

Mr. Wills: There have been nine occasions of such instances as quoted by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to review the workings of the Industrial Development Act 1982 in relation to the allocation of regional selective assistance. [90658]

Mr. Wills: I have no plans to review the workings of the Industrial Development Act 1982 for this purpose.

Miners (Compensation)

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how long ex-miners will have to wait for payments once they have been assessed as eligible under the compensation scheme. [91161]

Mr. Battle: Details of the time-scales for claimants passing through the various stages of the assessment process for Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease have still to be finalised. However, the intention is that individuals will receive an offer of compensation within 28 days of their detailed medical assessment having been completed and their eligibility for compensation established. Payment will then be made within 14 days of written confirmation that the offer has been accepted.

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claimants he estimates will use the ex-miner compensation lung-test centre facility in Bristol; and when he expects testing of those people to be concluded. [91160]

Mr. Battle: To date a total of 108 claimants have been assessed at the Bristol spirometry centre and a further 19 claimants, who have yet to respond to a letter of invitation, remain to be tested. In addition, 12 claimants in the Bristol area have provided doctors' letters which mean they will receive domiciliary visits.

Trade Mission (Turkey)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Ministers and Officials will be accompanying the outward mission to Turkey in September; and at what cost. [91177]

Mr. Wilson: British Trade International is supporting two outward missions to Turkey in September:

Business Link Bedfordshire: 13–17 September

Defence Manufacturers Association: 28 September-1 October.

No Ministers or Officials from my Department will accompany either mission.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what quantities of spent fuel have been imported from Spain, and on what dates; what safeguards arrangements cover the fuel; and what commitments there are to return the radioactive waste arising from reprocessing the fuel to Spain. [91171]

Mr. Battle: The timing and quantities of spent fuel imported to Sellafield for specific customers are a commercial and operational matter for BNFL and their customers. All civil nuclear material in the United Kingdom is subject to Euratom safeguards and to the terms of the UK/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement. Since 1976 all new contracts for the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of wastes. BNFL's overseas reprocessing contracts prior to 1976, including those with Spanish utilities, do not contain return of wastes options.

Post Office Appointments

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people have been recruited to the Post Office in the past 12 months from outside Northern Ireland; and what was their perceived religion. [91000]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I am informed that the hon. Member refers to recruitment to the Post Office within Northern Ireland. I understand from the Post Office that in the last 12 months it has not recruited anyone to fill a position in Northern Ireland who has recorded an address outside Northern Ireland.

Manufacturing Jobs (Northern Region)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of manufacturing jobs in the Northern Region in May of each year since 1979. [91006]

Mr. Battle: Information on a consistent basis is available from June 1982 and is shown in the table. Estimates for May are not available as the data are collected quarterly. The estimates refer to the former North standard statistical region, which comprised the counties and former counties of Cleveland, Durham, Northumberland, Tyne and Wear and Cumbria.

Biotechnology Industry

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the value of public investment in the biotechnology industry in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 (i) in total and (ii) as a percentage of total investment in the industry. [87768]

Mr. Battle: This information is not available from official statistics.

DTI and Research Council expenditure on support for technology transfer and innovation in the biotechnology industry is estimated at:

£12.8 million for the year 1998–1999; and

£15.6 million for the year 1999–2000.

These figures do not include expenditure by other Departments or by the Research Councils on basic research in the bio-sciences. The figures do include Research Council co-funding of LINK programmes.

Figures are not available for the total investment; but dedicated UK biotechnology companies themselves invested an estimated £319 million in R&D in 1997–78.

Takeovers Directive (Spanish Reservation)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the (a) nature and (b) consequences of the Spanish Gibraltar-related reservation on the designation of competent authorities for the Takeovers Directive; and what representations he has (i) received and (ii) made on the issue. [90396]

Mr. Ian McCartney: At the Internal Market Council on 21 June Spain maintained a general reserve on the proposed Takeovers Directive in respect of the designation of authorities for supervising bids in accordance with the Directive. Her Majesty's Government are considering currently whether any change to the relevant clause could be made which would safeguard Gibraltar's rights, while meeting Spanish concerns over the Directive. I have received no representations on this issue. Her Majesty's Government are liaising closely with the Government of Gibraltar and our European partners to find a solution which is acceptable to all parties.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Debt Relief

9. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what policies are being followed by her Department to prevent debt-relieved countries becoming indebted again. [89760]

Clare Short: The revision to the HIPC Initiative, which we hope will be finalised at the annual meeting of the World Bank and the IMF in September, will provide more debt relief to countries following sound pro-poor policies. This will increase the likelihood of countries achieving a permanent exit from their debt problems.

We provide all our aid through grants, not loans, and are encouraging others to do the same. We are also working to try to ensure that export credits are not provided for non-productive expenditure.

We are working with the World Bank and the IMF to bear down on corruption and to ensure that the Bank and the Fund support economic policy and social spending that benefit the poor.

13. Ms Ryan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what contribution her Department is making to the Government Review of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative. [89764]

Clare Short: We are working closely with the Treasury to influence the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Review being carried out by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. In the first phase, we submitted a joint paper on the need for faster, deeper and wider debt relief, and I am pleased that there is now an international consensus that more debt relief is required for countries committed to eradicating poverty. The second phase of the Review is currently under way and is examining how the link between debt relief and poverty reduction can be strengthened. We have recently submitted a further joint DFID and Treasury paper to the Review team, setting out our ideas and proposals. Decisions on this will be taken at the Annual Meetings of the IMF and the World Bank in September. Both papers are available in the Library.

15. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will report progress in tackling and reducing the debt of the heavily indebted poorer countries, following the Cologne summit. [89766]

Clare Short: The Cologne Debt Initiative represents a major step forward in the effort to remove the debt burden of the poorest countries. We welcome the commitment to a major improvement in the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative so that it delivers faster, wider and deeper debt relief to countries committed to eradicating poverty. If agreed at the annual meetings of the World Bank and the IMF, the HIPC initiative will provide twice as much debt relief, twice as quickly. It is also important that there was a call to cancel outstanding aid debts. These amount to $20 billion owed to the G7 countries alone. The UK has already cancelled the aid debts of the poorest countries, and we are pressing others to follow our lead. The UK has also made the largest pledge to the Millennium Trust Fund—a total of $171 million. It is important that everyone plays their part in funding the enhanced debt relief, and we are calling on the European Commission to make a substantial contribution.

22. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with NGOs on the progress of the heavily indebted poor countries initiative. [89773]

Clare Short: I regularly meet representatives from the NGOs to discuss key development issues including debt. At a meeting last month with the Directors of those NGOs which form the British Overseas Aid Group (BOAG), we discussed the G7 initiative on debt launched at the Cologne Summit. We also considered the second phase of the HIPC Review, which is examining how the link between debt relief and poverty reduction can be strengthened.

Serbia

10. Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what humanitarian aid her Department is providing for Serbia. [89761]

Mr. Foulkes: We provide humanitarian assistance wherever it is needed, but it is essential to verify need and proper use. Applying these principles in Serbia is difficult in view of limited independent access. We shall consider requests for assistance through international humanitarian organisations. ECHO have allocated a total of 26.5 million euros for humanitarian assistance to Serbia, of which the UK share will be some £2.5 million.

Nigeria

11. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about development assistance being given by her Department and the European Union to aid the return of Nigeria to democracy. [89762]

Clare Short: Britain and the EU provided significant support to the transition process which led to President Obasanjo's inauguration in May and the return of Nigeria to democracy.

The challenge for the new Nigerian government is to redirect their resources towards growth and development aimed at removing inequalities and eliminating poverty. International assistance will be needed. Britain and the EU are ready to help Nigerian government efforts to bear down on corruption and adopt reforms that benefit the poor.

AIDS

12. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what help the Government are providing to tackle the spread of AIDS in developing countries. [89763]

Clare Short: We are supporting HIV/AIDS work in 39 developing countries. We are also working with UNAIDS and other UN agencies to develop a more co-ordinated and intensified global response. We are funding research into development of new methods of protection against HIV, such as microbicides and an HIV/AIDS vaccine.

Sub-Saharan Africa

14. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what spending on aid for sub-Saharan Africa by her Department (a) was in 1997–98, (b) is in the current year and (c) is planned to be in 2000–01. [89765]

Clare Short: Bilateral country programme expenditure in sub-Saharan Africa in 1997–98 was £332.36 million. A firm figure for 1998–99 is not yet available, but expenditure is estimated to be at least £400 million. Planned outturn figures for 1999–2000 and 2000–01 are expected to be £450 million and £477 million respectively. In addition, we make substantial contributions to multilateral organisations, where our share of assistance in 1997 amounted to £217 million, much of which is spent in Africa.

World Poverty

16. Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress she is making with her plans for halving world poverty by 2015. [89767]

Clare Short: Great progress has already been made this century—more people have climbed out of poverty in the last 50 years than in the previous 500—but we must continue with our efforts at every level to meet this ambitious target. The plans for halving world poverty by 2015 are in place and set out in the 1999 Departmental Report, working both with our partners in country and internationally. It is achievable if the international system works together. It requires greater coherence of aid, trade, environment, agriculture and economic reform policies. We are engaging positively with all our partners to this end.

Balkans

19. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what additional requests for aid she has received since March for those countries in the Balkan area affected by the Kosovo conflict. [89770]

Clare Short: Requests for international assistance from countries affected by the Kosovo crisis have been handled within the framework of Donor's Conferences.

We have responded through our contributions to the EU and World Bank pledges which, to date, total some $200 million to Albania and $250 million to Macedonia. Bilaterally, we have committed £90 million in humanitarian assistance, much of which has been spent in Albania and Macedonia. We have also committed £10 million for technical assistance to the Governments of Albania and Macedonia to help strengthen their capacity to take forward key reforms and to help them absorb international assistance through improvements to their budgetary planning and assessment processes.

We expect that the proposed regional Stability Pact will provide a framework for discussing the regeneration of the Balkan region. The EU will be a key participant in this process and in the international reconstruction effort in Kosovo.

Kashmir

20. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to visit the Indian sub-continent before the end of the year to discuss the consequences of the conflict in Kashmir. [89771]

Clare Short: I visited India in March, before the start of the present fighting in Kashmir. I have no plans at present to visit the sub-continent again before the end of the year.

Kosovo

21. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the aid which she plans to make available for the reconstruction of Kosovo. [89772]

Clare Short: The EU, with the support of the World Bank, will assume leading responsibility for reconstruction within the overall UN-led civil implementation structure. They are co-ordinating damage and needs assessment and will organise donor conferences over the coming months to mobilise the necessary international effort. We contribute to EC funds and also intend to provide technical assistance to try to ensure that EC funds are well spent.

24. Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures her Department is taking to support reconstruction in Kosovo, with particular reference to assistance with mine clearance. [89776]

Clare Short: The EU, with the support of the World Bank, will assume responsibility for reconstruction within the overall UN-led civil implementation structure. They will organise donor conferences over the coming months to mobilise the international effort. We are working to ensure that the arrangements for managing EU assistance are effective.

We have already committed over £1.7 million in support of humanitarian mine actions and we are ready to do more through the United Nations Mine Action Co-ordination Centre (MACC) Kosovo programme.

St. Helena

23. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to visit the island of St. Helena to discuss improved transport links. [89774]

Clare Short: I have no plans to visit St. Helena. Later this month, the St. Helena Government will be receiving the Final Report of the preliminary desk study into the viability of air access to St. Helena. We will then discuss the report and possible changes in the scheduling of the RMS St. Helena with them.

Central America (Hurricane Mitch)

25. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action her Department is taking to assist countries in central America with reconstruction after Hurricane Mitch. [89777]

Clare Short: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) on 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 177.

Montserrat

26. Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her assessment is of the current humanitarian situation on the island of Montserrat. [89778]

Clare Short: The situation has improved considerably since the height of the volcanic activity in 1997. Accommodation has been or will have been provided by the end of the year for approximately 850 households—370 direct build houses, 338 self-build houses and permanent accommodation for 130 elderly people. Consideration is currently being given to providing the necessary infrastructure for a further 220 houses. It is intended that all those remaining in shelters will be given the opportunity to build their own homes or move into direct-build housing by March 2001.

We are supporting a health development programme to support the delivery of primary and secondary health care and to improve public health standards. Additionally, a major upgrade of the St. John's hospital is to be completed in August 1999. We are also assisting with the continued provision of education. A more targeted, comprehensive means-tested social support system is being developed to replace the current universal welfare scheme. Major investments have also been made to upgrade the infrastructure in the north of the island, including improvements to the roads, power and water supply and waste disposal.

These measures will continue to be built upon, in the context of the Montserrat Country Policy Plan for the period 1998–99—2000–2001 agreed between HMG and the Government of Montserrat, to which DFID is contributing £75 million.

IMF

27. Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact of IMF structural adjustment programmes on the economies of the third world. [89779]

Clare Short: Last year's review of the IMF's Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility (ESAF) recommended that the IMF should take more account of the social impact of their programmes, consider the quality of government expenditure and protect budgets in high priority areas such as health and education. We strongly welcomed this and are encouraging the IMF to work more closely with the World Bank to ensure that, in designing structural adjustment programmes, they take account of the impact on the poor. Following a proposal put forward by the UK, the World Bank is working with the IMF and the UN to develop good principles and practices of social policy, which will be drawn upon in the design of World Bank and IMF programmes. We continually emphasise the need for the IMF to build support for reform programmes, through discussion and consultation with civil society, so that they lead to economic growth which benefits the poor. A report on the implementation of the recommendations of the ESAF Review is expected in September.

Illegal Drugs

28. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans her Department has for additional measures aimed at encouraging developing countries to reduce the production and supply of illegal drugs. [89780]

Clare Short: We provide assistance to control the production of illicit drugs where this is part of sustainable policies for development. Current projects include support to farmers for alternative development in Pakistan, Peru and Bolivia; projects to reduce the demand for illicit drugs in South East Asia and Peru; and training and institution building projects for the Customs and the Police in the Caribbean. We will consider opportunities for the inclusion of drugs-related elements in current and future programmes, and we will continue to work with multilateral institutions which provide assistance to drugs-related activities.

Water Supplies

29. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance Her Majesty's Government have given to assist in water distribution in those areas of the world suffering from drought and rationing of water supplies. [89781]

Clare Short: DFID provides support in a number of ways to assist in addressing drought. Good management of water resources and drought preparedness planning are essential to mitigate the impact of drought. We are currently funding projects in a number of countries, including Zimbabwe and South Africa, to assist governments in such planning. DFID also actively supports the work of the UN agencies and the Global Water Partnership in long-term sustainable use of freshwater resources at country and regional levels. We provide direct assistance in the provision of water supplies in situations of drought. Recent examples of support include projects implemented by non government organisations such as Save the Children Fund (UK) and International Committee of the Red Cross in Malawi, Zimbabwe, Lesotho, Guyana, and Bolivia.

EC Development Assistance

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to improve the quality, effectiveness and poverty focus of EC development assistance. [89768]

Clare Short: There can be no doubt that the EC's development assistance programmes are not sufficiently poverty focused and are often ineffective. This is why we published a strategy paper at the end of last year containing 18 detailed proposals for strengthening our collaboration with the EC to improve the poverty focus and effectiveness of its programmes. We are pursuing implementation of this strategy vigorously, and I shall be making a speech in Brussels at the end of July setting out a reform agenda to strengthen the EC's role as we enter the new millennium.

The share of EC official development assistance going to the poorest countries has fallen from 75 per cent. in 1987 to 50 per cent. in 1997. The UK has proposed that for the proportion of EC official development assistance going to low-income countries should increase each year from 2000 to 2006, reaching 70 per cent. by 2006.

We will seek to ensure that poverty elimination is at the heart of the successor to the current Lomé Convention which provides the framework for the EU's aid, trade and political relations with 71 Africa, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

We will also seek to work with other member states and the Commission to implement the Council Conclusions on the Evaluation of the EC's development assistance programmes. These Conclusions were adopted at the Development Council on 21 May and provide a good basis to take the steps necessary to improve the EC's effectiveness.

UN Development Programme

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate she has made of the impact on international poverty alleviation of making available the United Nations Development Programme's estimated requirement of $80 billion in the current year. [89769]

Clare Short: The United Nations Development Programme, together with other UN organisations and the World Bank, has calculated that $80 billion per year would mean basic social services would be available to everyone in the world in the next 15 years. This would have an enormous impact on international poverty reduction and achievement of the International Development targets, particularly in the areas of health and education. Current international overseas development assistance is $50 billion.

The United Kingdom Government have made firm financial provision for an additional £1.6 billion of development assistance over the years 1999–2000—2001–02. But it is increasingly clear that aid spending is effective in reducing poverty only when sound policies are in place in recipient countries. Where this is lacking, aid is best spent on technical assistance to support reform and support for civil society so that it is able to press for the adoption of policy to reduce poverty.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91063]

Clare Short: Between May 1997 and 14 April 1998, 457 questions were tabled to my Department for a written answer on a named day; 95 per cent. received an answer on that day.

Child Labour

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what contribution her Department is making in the ILO's special programme for the eradication of child labour. [91141]

Clare Short: The ILO's special programme for the eradication of child labour—known as the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC)—has been supported by a central donation and country based collaboration from the Department as follows:

- $1 million towards the "core" activities of the IPEC programme in 1998–99;
- £58,000 for a baseline study of child labour in Tanzania in 1998–99 and preliminary planning expertise in 1999–2000;
- £750,000 over three years for collaborative work with Save the Children Fund in Pakistan, ILO/IPEC, Pentland Plc, the Sialkot Chamber of Commerce on removing children from the Football Stitching industry in Sialkot 1998–99 to 2000–01;
- £2.75 million to the IPEC programme in the Indian State of Andhra Pradhesh, 1998–99 to 2000–01;
- £100,000 to IPEC's Asia programme for collaborative initiatives to prevent child trafficking programme, 1997–98;
- £35,000 for IPEC preparatory work on child trafficking in Asia, 1998–99.

Somalia

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps are being taken to secure representation for Somalia in the negotiations on the successor to the Lomé Convention. [91090]

Mr. Foulkes: Somalia does not have a government and is not formally represented in the negotiations on a new convention. However, we are concerned that the Somali people should be able to benefit from Lomé. As part of the negotiations, we are therefore considering, with our EU partners, how to take account of countries like Somalia, who are members of the Lomé family but are not able to sign or ratify any future agreement. We are pressing hard to ensure that an equitable solution is reached.

Tobacco

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to prevent growth in the number of deaths due to smoking in the developing world. [91198]

Mr. Foulkes: We view with great concern the estimate by the World Health Organisation (WHO) that, if current trends continue, tobacco will be the leading cause of disease burden by 2030, causing about one in eight deaths, and that 70 per cent. of tobacco-related deaths will be in developing countries. We strongly support the priority given to tobacco control by WHO through its "Tobacco Free" initiative, and the efforts to establish an International Framework Convention (ITC) for tobacco control.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking to work towards a global ban on tobacco advertising. [91199]

Mr. Foulkes: We are committed to co-operating with other Governments in the establishment of an International Framework Convention (IFC) on tobacco control, which includes advertising. We have indicated our support to the World Health Organisation (WHO), who are co-ordinating this work and are discussing with them Britain's role in the first intergovernmental meeting to discuss the development of the framework. We are contributing £200,000 this financial year to WHO's "Tobacco Free" initiative.

Nepal

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance is being given to Nepal to help improve its educational infrastructure. [89775]

Clare Short: Our Country Strategy Paper, a copy of which will be sent to the hon. Gentleman, highlights low levels of education as one of the main causes of poverty in Nepal. A large number of donors are active in the sector. Many are involved in primary education. We are working with the Asian Development bank to raise the quality of secondary education. We are also promoting community literacy by helping local NGOs to improve their delivery of literacy training. We plan to work with Government, donors and civil society to promote a more co-ordinated approach to addressing needs across the entire education sector.

DEFENCE

Tour Intervals

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average interval between operational tours for (i) Infantry battalions, (ii) Royal Armoured regiments, (iii) Royal Logistical Corps units, (iv) Adjutant-General Corps units and (v) Royal Army Medical Corps units. [85914]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 8 June 1999]: In the past three years, tour intervals (in months) for Infantry battalions, Royal Armoured regiments, Royal Logistical Corps units and Royal Army Medical Corps units have been as follows:

Arm/service	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
Infantry	21	22	27

Royal Logistical Corps	18	18	12
Royal Army Medical Corps	—	—	—
Field Ambulance	24	37	30
Field Hospital	12	12	12

The Adjutant General Corps deploy as individuals, rather than in units and there are therefore no recorded unit tour intervals.

For the current year (1999–2000), the interval would depend on the circumstances of the individual unit and the overall level of commitment; however, if there is a continuation of existing levels of commitment and undermanning this would be likely to result in tour intervals (in months) for 1999–2000 as follows:

Arm/service	1999–2000
Infantry	15
Royal Armoured Corps	12
Royal Logistical Corps	11
Royal Army Medical Corps	—
Field Ambulance	20
Field Hospital	12

These statistics reflect an unprecedented level of commitment. We are actively seeking to reduce the Army's level of commitment, specifically in Bosnia, and particularly for those arms and services that are most heavily committed, with a view to reducing overstretch.

MOD Hospital Units

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if (a) terms and conditions of service of his Department's employees and (b) arrangements for priority treatment of service personnel are laid out in (1) legally binding contracts or (2) Service Level Agreements at his Department's hospital units at (i) Peterborough, (ii) Frimley Park and (iii) Derriford; and if he will make a statement. [88422]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Revised Customer Supplier Agreements (CSA) are being introduced to replace the Service Level Agreements (SLAs) existing with the host NHS Trusts for our Ministry of Defence Hospital Units (MDHUs) at Derriford, Peterborough and Frimley Park. The new financial model underpinning the CSAs is explained in Health Services Circular 1999/112 and is also being used for the CSA at our new MDHU at Northallerton. The agreements will not include details of the terms and conditions of service for military personnel. However, provision will exist in the agreements for the release of military personnel for operations, exercises and training. The agreements also include a commitment to the achievement of DSCA Key Targets 2 and 3, as set out on 20 May 1999, Official Report, column 436, and to the operational priority treatment of patients referred under specific criteria.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library copies of the contracts or Service Level Agreements governing relations between the relevant NHS trusts and his Department's hospital units at (a) Peterborough, (b) Frimley Park and (c) Derriford. [88424]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 28 June 1999]: Following detailed discussions with the NHS during 1997 and 1998, the principles of a new Service Level Agreement (SLA) have been developed to form a revised contract from 1999–2000 at the three existing Ministry of Defence Hospital Units (MDHUs) at Peterborough, Frimley Park and Derriford and at the new MDHU Northallerton. This model will also form the basis of all future MOD contracts relationships with the NHS for hosting staff or providing treatment. The new contract model which has been agreed with all partner NHS Trusts in principle, was published in a Health Circular 1999/112 dated 21 May 1999 and will form the basis of the agreements which will replace the existing SLAs. It is expected that the contracts between MOD and individual NHS Trusts will be signed shortly after minor financial negotiations have been completed. These contracts embody commercial arrangements between each Trust and the MOD negotiated on an individual basis and so I am withholding them under exemption of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Effective Management and Operations of the public service). However, a copy of Health Circular 1999/112 dated 21 May 1999 has been placed in the Library of the House.

Married Quarters

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the number of married quarters, (b) the number empty and (c) the vacancy rate as a percentage in each year since 1992. [90629]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The information requested is given in the table.

DHE occupancy and voids tracking—by financial year

Date	(a) Total stock	(b) Total void	(c) Void percentage
1996–97	65,800	13,142	19.97
1997–98	64,238	13,225	20.59
1998–99	62,420	13,568	21.74

Since its inception in 1985, the Defence Housing Executive has disposed of 8,000 properties and has targets to dispose of some 2,000 a year thereafter. Despite this disposal programme the total number of voids has remained fairly constant over recent years because of falling Service demand for family accommodation and decisions awaited on future deployments arising out of the Strategic Defence Review.

Out of the current total voids stock of some 13,568, 3,360 are temporarily vacant awaiting incoming Service occupants. A further management margin has to be allowed to cater for family size, work location and family choice in relation to schooling etc. 1,930 properties are temporarily empty while undergoing refurbishment and modernisation. A further 2,000 properties are in the process of return to Annington Homes Ltd., for sale or demolition. The remaining stock is being assessed under a long-term housing plan in relation to military need and condition from which further disposal decisions will be made.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by grade the condition of married quarters in (a) England and Wales, (b) Scotland, and (c) Northern Ireland giving the totals for (i) each grade and (ii) each of (a) (b) and (c); and what percentage the total of each grade represents of the whole stock. [90628]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The grading of condition of married quarters, which is established for rent purposes, is as follows:

England, Wales and Scotland

Grade	Number	Percentage
1	27,942	44
2	22,414	36
3	8,857	14
4	3,985	6
Total	63,195

Northern Ireland

Grade	Number	Percentage
1	106	4
2	1,299	43
3	1,206	40
4	376	13
Total	2,987

These figures do not refer solely to the condition of a property. They are based on a points system which identifies deficiencies and size and also takes into account the remoteness of the location to essential services.

The figure for Scotland is not separately maintained. The Defence Housing Executive has additionally, for the internal programming and prioritising of upgrade projects, put in place a marking system which is based on the Standard 1 for Condition definition, and which allocates points for a total of 106 property attributes dealing with for example Building Fabric, Kitchens, Energy Efficiency, etc. The worst marking of each individual group of the Standard becomes the overall Standard for the house for work scheduling. This is a very exacting standard which enables major deficiencies to be easily assessed and programmed.

A stock condition survey has been undertaken to support and inform the Upgrade programme. This has been analysed by the marking system which prioritises against the deficiencies in the property and not simply its overall condition. For example,

99.1 per cent. of the Building Fabric section complies with Standard 1

98.0 per cent. of Bedrooms comply with Standard 1

85.1 per cent. comply with Security requirements for Standard 1

59.0 per cent. of Kitchens comply with Standard 1

51.8 per cent. comply with Energy Efficiency requirements for Standard 1.

DHE now has in place Regional Upgrade Construction Contractors and Project managers to progress the upgrade programme aimed at achieving Standard 1 for Condition in the major part of the Housing Estate by 2005.

St. Malo Accord

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress made in (a) planning for non-combatant evacuation operations, (b) organising joint exercises, (c) improving links between operational headquarters, (d) co-ordinating naval deployments, (e) exchanging information on peacekeeping activities, (f) millennium computer compliance solutions, (g) common resourcing of logistics and (h) arrangements for dealing with the media in the light of the St. Malo Accord; which units, offices and desks are involved; and when the next ministerial meeting to discuss these issues is planned. [89822]

Mr. George Robertson: Signature of the Letter of Intent on crisis management and operations has allowed good progress to be made in co-operation with France, as shown particularly in Kosovo operations. Specific examples of co-operation covered by the Letter of Intent are: the posting of liaison officers into operational headquarters; the attachment of HMS Somerset, and latterly HMS Grafton, to the French FOCH Carrier Task Group in the Adriatic during the Kosovo conflict; the joint signing ceremony in New York on 25 June of Memoranda of Understanding between our respective Governments and the UN on troop availability for UN peacekeeping operations; and co-operation on media handling during the Kosovo conflict.

Airborne Surveillance Capability

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps the Government are taking to improve the UK's airborne surveillance capability. [90174]

Mr. Spellar: We are improving the UK's airborne surveillance capability in several ways. We have announced our intention to buy ASTOR, a high technology airborne ground surveillance system, which will substantially enhance our current capability. We are also procuring RAPTOR, a long-range reconnaissance sensor pod to be fitted to Tornado GR4, which will provide a day/night real time capability. We are modifying the radar in the E-3D sentry aircraft to counter improvements in stealth technology and missile capabilities and we are also upgrading the electronic reconnaissance capability of the Nimrod R. Also, in addition to the Phoenix Unmanned Aerial Vehicle, UAV system, which has already successfully entered service, we are considering procurement of further UAV systems for surveillance purposes.

Single Currency

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much spending his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) forecasts it will incur on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91181]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Any costs incurred to date would have been minor and accommodated within existing budgets. Their extent is not known centrally. Work is in train to establish processes for the identification and forecasting of possible future costs.

Chinook

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the reports on the US Army's experience of Chinook incidents and accidents which his Department has evaluated in the last 12 months. [90417]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Over the last 12 months, the US Army have issued the following Safety of Flight Messages (SoFM) and Aviation Safety Action Messages (ASAM) as a result of incidents and accidents to their CH47 fleet. Each message has been evaluated for applicability to the RAF HC Mk 2/2A Chinooks and where appropriate the action taken is described as follows:

ASAM—CH-47-98-ASAM-05 dated 17 September 1998—de-restricting the CH 47 fleet from roll on landings. Same details repeated within CH-47-ASAM-99-05 dated 22 April 1999.

MOD Action taken—issue of Servicing Technical Instruction (STI) STI/CHINOOK/318A dated 3 March 1999.

SoFM—CH-47-99-01 dated 30 January 1999—Main rotor synchronisation shaft bearing support bracket—check for adequate clearance.

MOD Action taken—issue of Preliminary Warning Instruction (PWI) PWI/CHINOOK/293 dated 27 May 1999.

ASAM—CH-47-99-ASAM-01 dated 9 February 1999—Mandatory maintenance requiring a one time inspection of Lag Dampers.

MOD Action taken—issue of PWI/CHINOOK/288A dated 4 June 1999.

ASAM—CH-47-99-ASAM-02 dated 16 February 1999—Mandatory maintenance requiring modifications to Boost Actuators.

MOD Action Taken—None required, no applicability, RAF only use post modified Boost Actuators.

ASAM—CH-47-99-ASAM-03 dated 23 February 1999—One time and recurring inspection of hoist/cargo hood control panel and water intrusion in cockpit.

MOD Action Taken—Awaiting advice from Boeing on applicability to RAF Chinook.

ASAM—CH-47-99-ASAM-04 dated 16 March 1999—CH47D and 47E Fwd and Aft Longitudinal Cyclic Trim Yoke Bushing—Inspection and aircraft manual changes.

MOD Action Taken—None required—MOD already has adequate inspection procedures in place within the HC Mk2/2A aircraft maintenance manuals.

My Department has also evaluated an extract from the United States Army investigation report of a non-fatal Chinook incident in which the aircraft suffered an uncommanded 360 degree barrel roll. This incident result in ASAM CH-47-99-02 detailed above where no remedial action was required as the Chinook Mk2s in service with the RAF have an improved standard of actuators fitted which overcome the suspected cause of the US army incident.

Kosovo Deaths

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the type of explosives that killed Lieutenant Gareth Evans and Sergeant Balam Rai in Kosovo; and if UK forces have been fully trained in the techniques and methods of disarming these explosives. [90392]

Mr. George Robertson: The munitions were from CBU 87 cluster bombs. As it is not possible to disarm this type of munition, the method for disposal is to destroy them. All troops deploying to theatre are briefed on the correct procedures should they encounter mines, unexploded ordnance or other explosive devices.

HEALTH

Waiting Times (By-pass Surgery)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes there have been to the waiting times for heart by-pass surgery in each health trust since his answer of 18 March 1999, Official Report, columns 736–38. [87851]

Mr. Hutton: Information on waiting lists by specialty are published quarterly in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Drugs

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many drugs have appeared in the NHS category D list in each of the last six months; and what is the average number of drugs which have appeared in the list over the last 12 months. [90052]

Mr. Denham: Between February 1999 and July 1999 the number of category D entries appearing in the Drug Tariff published by The Stationery Office each month were:

Month (1999)	Number
February	46
March	79
April	74
May	76
June	109
July	131

The average number listed per month between August 1998 and July 1999 was 60.

Suffolk Health Authority

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the (a) income and expenditure deficit or surplus and (b) the recurring deficit or surplus for Suffolk Health Authority for each of the past five years up to and including 1999–2000. [90360]

Mr. Denham: The information available is given in the table.

The income and expenditure surplus/(deficit) and recurring surplus/(deficit) for Suffolk Health Authority

Notes:

1. 1993–94 is not comparable with subsequent years as the accounts included the provision of services which were transferred upon the establishment of a trust.
2. 1996–97 and 1997–98 are not comparable with previous years due to change in accounting policy and a reorganisation of health bodies. Departmental funding from cash drawing to an accrual figure.
3. Latest available figures are for 1997–98, therefore there are no figures for 1998–99 or for 1999–2000.

Embryonic Stem Cells

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the controls on the importation of embryonic stem cells; and what estimate he has made of the number of such cells imported in the past year. [90624]

Ms Jowell: Research involving the removal of cells such as stem cells from human embryos is subject to strict control under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. Such research would require a licence from the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (HFEA). The importation of human embryos is also subject to the provisions of the Act.

The provisions of the 1990 Act do not extend to established cell cultures of embryonic origin. Such cell lines, including embryonic stem cells may be imported and used without requiring a licence from the HFEA.

Emergency Admissions

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by health authority the total number of emergency admissions in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [90401]

Mr. Hutton: Figures for the years 1992–93 to 1997–98 have been placed in the Library.

Nurses' Pay

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to limit the fees which NHS trusts may pay to nurses working for nursing agencies. [90528]

Mr. Denham: We are unaware of any occasions where National Health Service trusts have paid nurses fees while they are working for nursing agencies. Agency staff are normally paid directly by their agency, who in turn are paid by NHS trusts.

The NHS Executive is working with the Social Partnership Forum to review the use of bank and agency staff and alternative approaches to employment flexibility, with a view to recommending good practice guidance to NHS employers.

Cloning

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the new Commission of Inquiry into the HFEA/HGAC recommendations on cloning will be appointed. [90836]

Ms Jowell: I hope to announce the membership of the Chief Medical Officer's expert advisory group shortly.

Care Homes

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) of 6 July 1999, Official Report, column 498, concerning national standards for care homes, what the closing date for the consultation will be. [90925]

Mr. Hutton: The consultation exercise has not yet begun. People will be given three months from the issuing of the consultation pack in which to submit their comments.

Public Health Development Fund

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the proposed Health Development Agency will be responsible for spending from the new Public Health Development Fund. [90739]

Ms Jowell: The Public Health Development Fund will be administered by the Department.

Health Development Agency

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will take to ensure that the proposed Health Development Agency will be able to operate independently of Government when exercising its public health monitoring functions. [90740]

Ms Jowell: We anticipate that the Health Development Agency will have the status of a Special Health Authority and operate at arm's length from the Department. The Agency will be accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the delivery of its agreed work programme and objectives.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Museums

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the museums that have benefited from capital funding from the National Lottery and the amount which they have received. [90613]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Current records show that National Lottery distributors have awarded a total of £588 million of capital funding to 526 museum projects. I have placed a full list of projects, with the amounts awarded, in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many hits the 24 Hour Museum website has received since it was launched. [90610]

Mr. Alan Howarth: In the period from its launch on 13 May to 4 July 1999, the 24 Hour Museum website received 3,436,155 hits.

Libraries

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the (a) number and (b) percentage of local libraries that have IT capabilities. [90618]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The latest statistics on use of ICT in public libraries were collected late in 1997 and showed the following trends in the then 191 UK library authorities:

	Percentage
Use of computerised book issue and discharge systems	95
Computerised catalogue system	75
Service points with public access to online catalogue	48
Public access to CDRom databases	85
Service points with access to Internet for public use	5

The Library and Information Commission is currently updating these data as part of the development of the Public Library ICT Network, which will link all public libraries, where practicable, to the National Grid for Learning by 2002.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much National Lottery money has been spent to date on grants for library ICT projects. [90617]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Lottery funding totalling £70 million for the ICT training of public library staff and the digitisation of material to support lifelong learning will be available through the New Opportunities Fund (NOF) from early 2000. A related £200 million NOF programme for Community Access to Lifelong Learning, focusing substantially on the development of the public library IT network and community grids for learning, will be the subject of consultation later this year.

Digital Television

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the number and location of sites in Wales that can and will provide digital television services; and how many television viewers in Wales will not be covered by digital service transmitters. [90738]

Janet Anderson: Nine transmitters sites located in Wales are included in the launch phase for digital terrestrial television. They are as follows: Aberdare, Blaenplwyf, Carmel, Kilvey Hill, Llanddona, Moel-y-Pac, Pontypool, Pressely and Wenvoe.

Coverage across each of the six multiplexes from the nine Welsh transmitters in the launch phase is as follows:

Welsh transmitter	Percentage
BBC	70
ITV/Channel 4	63
SDN (including Channel 4 and S4C)	60
MUX B ONdigital	77
MUX C ONdigital	31.5
MUX D ONdigital	31

British Library

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is his estimate of the building costs of the new building for the British Library; and if he will estimate the value of contracts associated with this construction with companies based in (a) London, (b) the South East of England, (c) England, (d) Scotland, (e) Wales and (f) Northern Ireland. [90858]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The British Library St. Pancras project is working to a cash estimate of £511.1 million. The final figure may increase slightly when all the outstanding claims and final accounts have been settled. Some 160 contracts were let for the project which was completed two years ago. The construction cost data were not collected by company on a regional basis but by type of product.

CABINET OFFICE

Anti-discrimination Legislation

Ms Shipley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will make a statement on the Government's response to the Better Regulation Task Force review of anti-discrimination legislation. [91665]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I have today placed copies of the Government's formal response to the Better Regulation Task Force review of anti-discrimination legislation in the Libraries of the House. The Task Force has made a timely, constructive and challenging contribution to the Government's thinking on these highly important issues. The Government are committed to eliminating all unlawful discrimination, and have accepted the majority of the Task Force proposals. We believe this response to the Task Force, in tandem with our responses today on similar issues to the proposals put forward by the equality Commissions, sets out in the strongest possible terms our commitment to a modern and diverse society.

The Government have accepted the Task Force's main recommendation, that a major legislative overhaul is not necessary at this stage, either in relation to the individual regimes, or in bringing them together. However, the Government agree that much more can be done to make the existing regimes work more effectively, by setting a lead in their own actions as policy makers, a service provider and employer; by encouraging the equality Commissions to act in a more targeted, strategic and joined-up manner; and by encouraging business to seize the initiative and adopt best practices more widely in this area.

To help businesses comply, the Government will further encourage the Commissions to consult with employers on producing simple, clear advice and guidance which everyone (especially small and medium employers) can quickly and easily act upon. This will include clarifying employer obligations in some key areas. Our Civil Justice and Legal Aid Reforms, along with the new Community Legal Service, will help ensure that ordinary citizens will have better and fairer access to justice.

Access Business Group

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what changes there have been to the membership of the Access Business Group, set up to consider how central and local governments' regulatory advice and service can be made more transparent, accessible and helpful. [91666]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Access Business Group was set up in July 1997 under my chairmanship. I have recently invited my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to join the group in view of the importance of small businesses to the Government's growth and productivity agenda. The other members are the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, in addition to Teresa Graham of the Better Regulation Task Force and Councillor John Ryan OBE, (Barnsley MBC) of the Local Government Association.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90530]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Cabinet Office carried out a staff attitude survey in May 1999. The information that respondents were asked to provide included details of age, gender, ethnic origin and disability, and analyses of these categories were included in the survey's findings.

Civil Servants

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the number and percentage of civil servants employed at each grade in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) London, (d) the South East of England, (e) Wales, (f) Northern Ireland and (g) the United Kingdom in total at the latest available date. [90861]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Numbers and percentages of staff in the Home Civil Service in the areas and responsibility levels[1] specified are set out in tables 1 and 2. The full detail requested is not available for all staff. However, estimates covering 97 per cent. of permanent non-industrial staff in the Home Civil Service are set out in tables 3 and 4.

[1] Responsibility levels are an approximate assignment of staff to a level of seniority broadly equivalent to the former service-wide grades.

Departmental Salaries

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the number of his Department's employees by United Kingdom region, indicating the wage bill (a) in total and (b) by region in the most recent year for which figures are available, separately identifying the costs of London allowances and weightings. [90864]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Information in respect of the Department's agencies is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Therefore this response relates to the core Department only.

The Cabinet Office employed 1,130 staff during financial year 1998–99. All staff are based in the south east of England. The vast majority of staff are located in central London, although there are small regional offices in Norwich and Basingstoke.

The wage bill for the Department during this period was £37,404,000. This figure includes National Insurance and superannuation costs.

London allowances were consolidated into basic pay with effect from 1 August 1997 and therefore it is not possible to provide a separate figure for these costs.

Ministerial Drivers

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many drivers allocated to Ministers have been (a) stopped, (b) cautioned, (c) charged and (d) convicted of motoring offences since 1 May 1997, giving in each case (i) the nature of the offence, (ii) the date of the offence and (iii) the minister to whom the driver was allocated. [91273]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Government Car and Despatch Agency. I have asked its Chief Executive, Mr. Nick Matheson, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Nick Matheson to Mr. Norman Baker, dated 14 July 1999:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me in my capacity as Chief Executive of the Government Car and Despatch Agency to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of this Agency's drivers who have been convicted of motoring offences since 1 May 1997.

The Agency only holds records for motoring convictions. It does not hold any information about drivers who have been stopped, cautioned, or charged but not successfully prosecuted with motoring offences. Since 1 May 1997 only one driver has been convicted of two speeding offences whilst on official duty. Both convictions are dated 2 April 1999. I am reluctant to name the minister to whom the driver was allocated at the time because it would be easy to identify the individual concerned and this would constitute an invasion of privacy.

Single Currency

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how much expenditure his Department has (a) incurred to date and (b) forecast to be incurred, on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91089]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 14 July. [89793]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I will have further such meetings later today.

EU Meetings

Mr. Norman: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will list the meetings which have taken place in the last month between his adviser on European affairs and EU ambassadors; and for each meeting, if he will list those who accompanied him, and specify the purpose of the meetings. [90121]

The Prime Minister: A number of civil servants and special advisers in my office provide me with information and advice on European matters. In the past month, in addition to attending the meetings I hold with EU ambassadors, my advisers have had bilateral discussions on matters of mutual interest with the Danish and Spanish ambassadors. There was also a meeting with the Swedish Ambassador to discuss the situation in Kosovo.

Arms Exports (Eritrea)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his Government's response to the involvement of a British company in an arms consignment destined for Eritrea, seized at Antwerp on 7 February; what assistance has been supplied (a) to that company and (b) to the national authorities involved; and what changes to departmental procedures have resulted. [86643]

The Prime Minister: We have no information on the seizure of an arms consignment on 7 February in Antwerp. But we are aware that a shipment of goods originating in Germany, destined for Eritrea, was seized by Belgian Customs authorities in Antwerp in August 1998. The Belgian Embassy in London notified us in November 1998 that a British company was involved in organising the shipment. The matter is currently before the Belgian courts.

The British company, JMT Charlesworth Ltd., applied in 1997 for a DTI-funded Export Marketing Research Scheme grant. The grants are open to British companies with less than 500 employees wishing to research specific overseas markets and are payable after the work has been successfully completed. This was a legitimate request and the company received a grant of just over £1,000 following their study of the market for used, refurbished trucks for sale to Eritrea and Ethiopia. Since the seizure of the shipment the company has received no assistance from the British Government.

In line with our ethical foreign policy we supported UN Security Council Resolution 1227 of 10 February 1999 which demanded a cessation of hostilities between Ethiopia and Eritrea and called for a voluntary arms embargo. We announced on 15 February that the United Kingdom had implemented this arms embargo. We were also instrumental in the adoption by the European Union of a common position on 15 March 1999 implementing an EU arms embargo on Ethiopia and Eritrea.

Human Rights

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those countries held by the Government to be in breach of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. [90920]

The Prime Minister: While the Universal Declaration was not itself a legally binding treaty, it set the framework for human rights obligations in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESR). The ICCPR has been ratified by 143 states and the ICESR by 141 states. The UK ratified both these Treaties within 7 months of their coming into force in 1976. UN independent expert committees monitor the performance of individual states under these Treaties. The committees report their findings publicly, including failures of implementation. But neither they nor we attempt comparative assessments on what are wide ranging obligations.

South Africa

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the discussions held by his advisers in South Africa in January on the issue of reconciliation; which policy advisers were involved; whom they met; what topics of United Kingdom interest were discussed; and what policy changes ensued. [90943]

The Prime Minister: I was accompanied by the Head of my Policy Unit and my policy advisers on criminal justice, and health and local government. As part of the ongoing and wide-ranging dialogue between the United Kingdom and South Africa, my advisers, together with FCO officials, had discussions with advisers in the Deputy President's office. These discussions, which took place in the run up to the recent elections, focused on the challenges facing an incoming Administration committed to a reforming agenda.

Civil Wars

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those civil wars since May 1997 in which he (a) made a decision to intervene and (b) decided against intervention; and if he will list the nature of the military intervention in each case. [90921]

The Prime Minister: Preventing and resolving violent conflict, including internal conflict, is a key foreign policy objective for this Government. Since May 1997 we have worked actively with our partners in the Security Council, European Union and elsewhere to find diplomatic solutions to conflicts around the world. Militarily, we have taken action with our NATO partners in Kosovo to prevent an overwhelming humanitarian catastrophe; and with the United States in Iraq to prevent repression of the civilian population and Iraq's posing a threat to its neighbours. We currently have troops deployed to UN authorised or led peacekeeping operations in Bosnia, Sierra Leone, Cyprus, Georgia, East Timor and on the Iraq/Kuwait border.

Government Policies

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on progress made with putting into effect the Government policies set out in the Queen's Speeches in 1997 and 1998 [90869]

The Prime Minister: Fifty-two Government bills became law in the 1997–98 parliamentary Session, including those to raise standards in education, delivering our manifesto commitment on constitutional reform, tackling crime, ensuring economic stability through Bank of England independence, and ensuring fairness at work through measures such as the national minimum wage.

In the 1998 Queen's speech we undertook to bring forward legislation on a wide range of issues including modernising the National Health Service, delivering on our pledge to modernise the youth justice system, and through our welfare reform programme. Ten bills have reached Royal Assent and a further 18 are on course to do so before the end of the Session.

The Government's Annual Report will be published towards the end of this month and this will detail progress on the Government's entire programme as set out in the manifesto. The Report will also set out what the Government's priorities are for the coming years.

European Commission

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the proposed appointments to the European Commission; and if he will list the experience and expertise of each nominated commissioner which is relevant to their portfolio. [91172]

The Prime Minister: Mr. Prodi announced on 9 July the people he and member states intended to nominate as Commissioners and their proposed areas of responsibility. The nominees will now be put to the European Parliament for approval, most probably at its September plenary.

It is not for any Government to comment on other member states' nominees. The two British candidates are both extremely well suited to the posts for which they have been nominated.

Advisory Committee on Business Appointments

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the members of the Advisory Committee on Business Appointments; and if he will make a statement. [91667]

The Prime Minister: Sadly, Lord Gillmore of Thamesfield, who became Chairman of the Committee in February, died shortly after taking up his appointment.

Lord Mayhew has agreed to become the new Chairman, and I intend to appoint shortly a new member of the Committee to fill the vacancy left by Lord Gillmore.

The current membership of the Committee is as follows:

The right hon. Lord Mayhew of Twysden QC—(Chairman)

Sir John Blelloch KCB—(Vice-chairman)

The right hon. Lord Shore of Stepney

The right hon. Baroness Williams of Crosby

Admiral Sir Kenneth Eaton GBE, KCB, FEng, FIEE

Sir Denys Henderson

Sir Bryan Nicholson.

All the appointments are unpaid, and I am grateful to the members for the time they give to the Committee.

TREASURY

Air Passenger Duty

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to abolish the domestic flight return-leg exemption from air passenger duty; and if he will make a statement. [90813]

Mrs. Roche: We are considering how to respond to the European Commission's challenge to the domestic return leg exemption.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of his Department's employees by UK region, indicating the wage bill (a) in total and (b) by region in the last year for which figures are available, separately identifying the costs of London allowances and weightings. [90565]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 13 July 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to "Civil Service Statistics 1998" which is placed in the Libraries of the House. This will show total numbers of staff in Departments and Agencies and the number of employees by UK region for Inland Revenue, HM Customs and Excise, National Savings, the Office for National Statistics, HM Treasury and the Royal Mint.

Figures indicating the wage bill, in total and by region are shown in the table. The costs of London allowances and weightings have been separately identified, where available.

[1] The Debt Management Office came into existence on 1 April 1998, so no figures are available for 1997–98.
[2] London weightings for Treasury staff below Senior Civil Service level were consolidated into the pay system at 1 April 1996. The figure given therefore represents London Weighting and London Allowance for Senior Civil Service Grades only.
[3] The Inland Revenue consolidated London Weighting into basic pay on 1 August 1994. Separate London Weighting was no longer paid after that date; therefore the cost cannot be separately identified.
[4] The Value Office Agency pay structure does not separately identify London Allowances and Weightings, but a best estimate has been provided.
[5] London Weighting is absorbed into the Royal Mint and ONS pay scales; therefore figures are unavailable.
Note:
All figures in £ million—because of roundings, the sum of entries in each column may differ slightly from the total.

Child Carers

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will review the tax system with a view to removing measures which disadvantage single earner families where the wife remains at home to look after children. [89894]

Dawn Primarolo: All aspects of the tax system are kept under review and the Chancellor has announced a range of measures in his Budgets benefiting single earner families, in which one partner stays at home to look after children. They include the Working Families' Tax Credit from October 1999 and the new children's tax credit from April 2001. In addition, he has announced substantial increases in Child Benefit, the first of which took effect in April 1999. As a result of the measures announced, a single earner family on average male earnings with two children will be £460 a year better off.

Married Man's Tax Allowance

Mr. Fabian Hamilton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reassess the married man's tax allowance to take account of the added financial responsibility of supporting a non-earning and dependent wife. [89896]

Dawn Primarolo: The higher personal allowance available to a married man became the married couple's allowance with the introduction of independent taxation in 1990–91. The Chancellor announced in his Budget statement this year, 9 March 1999, Official Report, columns 173–91 that, as part of a package of reform of income tax reliefs, the married couple's allowance would be abolished from 6 April 2000 for couples aged under 65 at that date. It will be replaced from 6 April 2001 by the children's tax credit, which will be worth up to twice as much for families with children.

Vehicle Repairs (VAT)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the liability for VAT on work done by vehicle repair shops owned by insurance companies; and if he will make a statement. [91315]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have received a number of representations on the VAT treatment of vehicle repairs carried out by motor insurers.

Customs are reviewing this issue.

Working Families Tax Credit

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of households which will become eligible for the new child care tax credit from October in each region of England and Wales; and what the projected change is in the number of claimants as compared with the family credit child care disregard. [90642]

Dawn Primarolo: I regret that it is not possible to provide reliable estimates of the number of families who will receive the childcare tax credit as part of the Working Families' Tax Credit for each Government Region in England and Wales.

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many households in each region of England and Wales he estimates will become entitled to working families tax credit in October; how many additional households in each region will receive working families tax credit compared with family credit; and what proportions these figures represent of the number of households in work in each region. [90641]

Dawn Primarolo: Estimates for 2000–01, the first full year of the Working Families' Tax Credit, are given in the table.

Government office region	Number of families in receipt of Working Families' Tax Credit	Percentage of families in work	Number of families in receipt of Working Families' Tax Credit who would not have received Family Credit	Percentage of families in work

Total England and Wales	1,220,000	7	430,000	3

Note:
Figures for families are rounded to the nearest thousand and may not sum to totals.

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the (a) average and (b) maximum additional benefit is for claimants of working families tax credit as compared with family credit for each region in England and Wales. [90643]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that in 2000–01, the first full year of the Working Families Tax Credit, the average weekly gain for families in receipt of the credit, compared with Family Credit, is £24. This includes families who would not have been in receipt of Family Credit. Estimated average gains for each region of England and Wales are given in the table.

The maximum gain from the Working Families Tax Credit depends upon the circumstances of individual families, in particular the number of children and the expenditure on eligible child care. It is not possible to forecast what this maximum gain will be.

Correspondence

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to reply to the letter from Mr. Barnes of Barton Court Road, New Milton, of 22 March. [90761]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue were asked to reply to Mr. Barnes, and did so on 13 July. They have apologised to him for the delay.

Household Statistics

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of and how many households in the UK are accounted for by (a) married couples with children, (b) cohabiting couples with children, (c) single mothers with children, (d) single fathers with children, (e) single men and women under pension age, (f) single pensioners and (g) pensioner couples; [90326]

(2) what evidence he has of the percentage of (a) men and (b) women who work until pension age without a career break, and of those who have breaks in their careers; and what are the average total time spent out of work for each sex, and the average length of time of each break in career; [90325]

(3) if he will list for the most recent available date the percentage and number of (a) married couples and (b) cohabiting couples in which (i) both work full-time, (ii) both are unemployed, (iii) the man works full-time and the woman works part-time, (iv) the woman works full-time and the man works part-time, (v) both work part-time, (vi) the man works full-time and the woman is unemployed, (vii) the woman works full-time and the man is unemployed, (viii) the man works part-time and the woman is unemployed and (ix) the woman works part-time and the man is unemployed, showing figures separately for those with and without dependent children. [90324]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 8 July 1999]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Terry Rooney, dated 12 July 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your three recent parliamentary questions (90324, 90325 and 90326) on households, families and career breaks.

In answer to your question about couples according to the status of the 'husband' and 'wife' I attach two tables. Table 1a gives estimates from the spring 1998 Labour Force Survey (LFS) of actual numbers comparing the labour market status of the husband/man with that of his wife/partner for the four different couple types requested. For example, looking at the block for married couples without dependent children you can see that there were 997,000 couples where the husband worked full-time and the wife worked part-time. Table 1b shows this information in terms of percentage breakdowns. These analyses have been based on all working age couples i.e. couples where both the husband and the wife are of working age. Working age is defined as 16–59 for women and 16–64 for men.

LFS estimates have also been used to answer your question about households by type of household and family (see table 2).

Regarding your third question about those reaching retirement age and the incidence and average length of any career breaks they may have taken, I regret that the ONS cannot provide any directly relevant information.

[2] Dependent children are those aged 0–15, and those aged 16–18 in full-time education.

[3] ILO unemployment—The International Labour Office measure refers to people who are without a job, available to start work within two weeks and who had either looked for work in the previous weeks or were waiting to start a job they had already obtained.

[4] Inactive—those who are neither in employment nor ILO unemployed are defined as being economically inactive.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Special Advisers

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the President of the Council if she will list the subject and date of each written briefing prepared by her special advisers for all Labour Members since May 1997 and the total number and total cost to date of these. [89997]

Mrs. Beckett: Special Advisers are appointed under terms and conditions set out in the Model Contract for Special Advisers. Schedule 1, Part 1 of the Model Contract sets out the role and duties of Special Advisers. As well as research for Ministers and reviewing papers, contributing to policy planning within the Department and preparing policy papers, speech writing and liaison with outside interest groups, their role explicitly includes liaising with the Party and helping to brief Party MPs. Records are not held of when such briefings are given. Similar arrangements have applied under successive Governments.

Portcullis House

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will list the type and designation of the electrical cable used to wire (i) the lifts, (ii) the standby generation system, (iii) the emergency lighting system, (iv) the fire alarm system and (v) the smoke extraction system in Portcullis house. [90704]

Sir Sydney Chapman: I have asked the Director of Works to write to the hon. Member and place a copy of his reply in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Communities Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the European Communities working groups which met over the last 12 months with a representative from his Department in attendance; if he will list the number of times each met; if he will indicate the nature of the Government's representation; and if he will make a statement. [88474]

Ms Quin: Officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office regularly attend more than 50 working groups, most notably those dealing with the EU's external relations.

The frequency of meetings varies from group to group. For example, the ad hoc Lomé working group meets weekly, while the Euro-Med group meets monthly. The Government are always represented at these meetings by officials from the FCO or by officials from the UK's Permanent Representation in Brussels.

There is no record of the exact number of times each working group has met. Given the large number of groups involved it would be extremely difficult and time consuming to compile such a record.

River Danube

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has made of when the River Danube in Serbia will be open for normal commercial traffic; what assessment he has made of the effect of the blocking of the River Danube to commercial traffic on the economies of adjacent states other than Serbia; and what help is being given by NATO and the EU to adjacent states whose commercial and industrial traffic has been affected by the blocking of the Danube by destroyed Serbian bridges. [90004]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We do not know when the River Danube will be open for normal commercial traffic. We are in close touch with all the countries surrounding Serbia, and with the international financial institutions who are carrying out economic impact assessments. We have already contributed to packages of support for those countries, other than Serbia, most directly affected, and will continue to do so.

Single Currency

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur in the future, on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91237]

Ms Quin: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

Arms Sales

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the consolidated report to the Council on the EU Code of Conduct on arms sales will be made public. [90700]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Member states have yet to decide whether to make public the consolidated report on the operation of the Code of Conduct. This is likely to depend on the extent to which the report, which has not yet been agreed, contains information which member states have agreed should remain confidential, such as details of individual licence refusals and consultations between member states. Any changes to the Code as a result of the report will by definition be made public.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidance supplied to posts overseas on the application of the Working Time Directive. [90699]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I am placing in the Library of the House a copy of the guidance supplied to posts overseas on the application of the Working Time Directive/ Regulations.

Yugoslavia

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for future support of Radio B-92 in Yugoslavia; and what measures he is planning to encourage the restoration of former management. [90941]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Her Majesty's Government will not offer any support to Radio B-92 as long as it is being run by the Milosevic regime.

FCO officials have met with the exiled representative of Radio B-92 and are discussing means of restoring the station to its rightful owners.

International Labour Organisation

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his policy regarding adherence to International Labour Organisation legislation; and which human rights instruments (a) have been rejected, (b) are under consideration and (c) have been accepted in principle, where the United Kingdom had not fully acceded, since May 1997. [90944]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government are committed to supporting and promoting adherence to the standards and principles of the International Labour Organisation (ILO). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has lead responsibility for Government policy towards the ILO.

Our commitment to the ILO is matched by action. At the International Labour Conference (ILC) in June 1999, we played a leading role in securing agreement to a new Convention on the Worst Forms of Child Labour, which becomes one of the ILO's core labour standards. At that Conference, we also announced our ratification of the ILO Convention 111 on Discrimination in Employment, one of the core labour conventions. At the ILC in June 1998, we played a key role in the agreement of a Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work. And we are currently reviewing our position on ILO Convention 138 on Minimum Age of employment, the only one of the seven existing core labour conventions that the UK has yet to ratify. The UK has ratified a total of 66 conventions, which bears favourable comparison with other industrialised countries.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department announced the outcome of the Government's review of international human rights instruments in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) on 3 March 1999, Official Report, columns 756–57. Since then, on 31 March 1999 we signed the Second Optional Protocol to the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights, and on 20 May 1999 we ratified protocol 6 to the European Convention on Human Rights. Both protocols concern abolition of the death penalty.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91066]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: 2,351 parliamentary questions have been tabled to the FCO for named day answer since 2 May 1997. Our existing database does not allow us to determine which of them received a substantive response on that named day without manually checking each question. To do so would incur disproportionate cost.

Immigration Office, Islamabad

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many entry clearance applications for indefinite leave to remain from Islamabad have been made in each year since 1992. [90981]

Mr. Hoon: The following are the figures requested:

Year	Settlement applications
1994	6,973
1995	7,869
1996	7,988
1997	9,183
1998	10,837

Notes:

1. The figures relate to applications in Islamabad for settlement entry clearance. The term 'Indefinite leave to remain' refers to the removal of conditions of entry by the Home Office after an individual subject to immigration control has spent a qualifying period in the UK.
2. Information for 1992 and 1993 is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.
3. Further figures on settlement applications for the years 1994–98 inclusive can be obtained from the Global Entry Clearance Statistics, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the average turn-round time for processing applications for (a) visit visas and (b) marriage visas from Islamabad has changed over the last five years. [90974]

Mr. Hoon: Non-settlement visa applicants dealt with at Tier 1 or 2 will normally have their application processed within 24 hours. The percentage of visa applicants dealt with at Tier 1 and 2 has risen from 52 per cent. in 1994 to 54 per cent. in May 1999. Only those processed at Tier 3 (non-settlement) or Tier 4 (settlement) will be recalled at a later date for interview. Waiting times for these two tiers have been collated only since 1996 and are as follows:

Tier 3 (non-settlement)

Date	Waiting time (days)
At 31 December 1996	3
At 31 December 1997	11
At 31 December 1998	18

Tier 4 (settlement)

	Waiting time (months)
Date	Queue 2	Queue 3
At 31 December 1996	4	6
At 31 December 1997	4	5
At 31 December 1998	6	7

Note:

Settlement applications in Islamabad are dealt with in four queues:
Q1: Right of Abode claimants, dependent relatives over 65, special compassionate cases.
Q2: Spouses, children under 18.
Q3: Fiance(e)s, other categories.
Q4: Re-applicants.

Persons applying for settlement in UK in order to join a spouse or parent are dealt with at queue 2; those coming to the UK to marry and settle are dealt with in queue 3. The latter also includes other visa applicants and is not solely for the categories mentioned. Waiting times fluctuate during the year. Further details on waiting times are obtainable from the Global Entry Clearance Statistics, copies of which are held in the House of Commons Library.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visitor's visas have been (a) made and (b) granted in each year since 1992; and how many in each year were from Islamabad. [90980]

Mr. Hoon: The following are the figures requested:

	Worldwide		Islamabad
	Received	Issued	Received	Issued
1994	1,086,381	980,054	35,472	25,187
1995	1,167,295	1,042,667	35,597	22,130
1996	1,372,056	1,240,341	31,354	19,730
1997	1,372,314	1,243,987	23,828	14,726
1998	1,397,431	1,246,034	38,250	26,737

Note:
1. Information for 1992 and 1993 is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.
2. Further figures on non-settlement applications for the years 1994–98 inclusive can be obtained from the Global Entry Clearance Statistics, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Argentina

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Argentina. [91145]

Mr. Robin Cook: British and Argentine delegations met in London on 13 and 14 July to continue their dialogue on South Atlantic issues of common interest. I led the United Kingdom delegation, which included Members of the Falkland Islands Legislative Council.

I signed a Joint Statement with the Argentine Foreign Minister and exchanged letters recording understandings reached in these discussions on flights between the Falklands and South America, permission for Argentine passport-holders to visit the Falklands, co-operation against illegal fishing and other confidence-building measures. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

This agreement has the approval of the Falkland Islands Legislative Councillors. It is an important advance for our relations with Argentina and will encourage friendship and trust between Argentina and the Falklands Islands. It has our whole-hearted support.

Mr. Al-Sayegh

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what factors underlie his conclusion that Mr. Al-Sayegh of Bolton holds both British and Bahraini nationality. [91055]

Mr. Hoon: Mr. Al-Sayegh is a Bahraini national by birth and also a British national, having been granted British nationality in 1995 through his marriage to a British citizen. The Bahrainis have assured us that Mr. Al-Sayegh has not lost or been deprived of his Bahraini nationality.

Diplomatic Staff Cars

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on the purchase, and use of, official cars for United Kingdom ambassadors and high commissioners serving overseas; what make of cars have been purchased over the past 12 months for ambassadors, high commissioners and other senior diplomatic staff overseas; and to which individual diplomats they have been supplied. [90951]

Mr. Hoon: 1. Flag cars are provided for official use of Ambassadors and High Commissioners and are not specifically assigned to individual diplomats.

2. Government policy is to advertise our requirements for flag cars in the Official Journal of the European Commission and to set up framework contracts with successful bidders against which individual cars are purchased as the need arises. The FCO currently has framework contracts, negotiated in 1996, with Rolls Royce, Jaguar, Rover and Land Rover.

3. The makes of flag car purchased during the last 12 months are Rolls Royce, Jaguar, Rover and Land Rover, Volvo, Opel, Ford and a Grand Marquis in Caracas. Details, including the Missions to which the cars have been allocated, are shown in the attached list. The few cars purchased outside the existing framework contracts are used in countries where European cars cannot be properly maintained.

BACKGROUND NOTE

1. The FCO has, in the last 12 months, bought the following 45 flag cars:

2. 1 × Rolls Royce, 15 × Jaguars, 6 × Rover 800s, 2 × Volvos, 1 × Opel saloon cars, 6 × Land Rover Discoverys and 12 × Range Rovers. A Grand Marquis was bought for Caracas and a Ford Mondeo for Ascension Island, as neither UK nor European cars could be supported in those countries.

3. The Embassies and High Commissions concerned were:

Market Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the title and purpose of each item of market and opinion research commissioned by or through his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, stating in each case whether the results were published. [89696]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 5 July 1999]: Since May 1997, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has funded three pieces of public opinion research centrally. A survey of opinion formers in Pakistan and a public image survey in the Eastern Caribbean helped to establish how Britain is perceived in these two areas, to highlight misconceptions, and to measure Britain's profile. Results of these two surveys have not been published. A survey on British public attitudes to Europe in 1997 helped us prepare for the EU Presidency; a copy of the results has been placed in the Libraries of the House. It would involve disproportionate costs to provide the information requested for work carried out by individual FCO posts.

Gibraltar

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the European Commission concerning the obstruction of movement between Spain and Gibraltar. [90143]

Ms Quin: Our Permanent Representative to the EU, Sir S. Wall, wrote to the President of the European Commission on this subject on 11 February, and again on 22 June. Our Permanent Representation was in regular contact with the Commission in the intervening period.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for International Development concerning human rights in Zimbabwe. [90136]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the International Development Secretary meet to discuss issues that relate to the work of both departments. Officials from both departments co-ordinate policy closely in the UK and in a large number of countries worldwide, including Zimbabwe. The Government's commitment to human rights is central to the work of both departments.

British Subjects (Death Abroad)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the treatment of the widow of a British subject who died in April this year in the Gambia, a constituent, whose name has been supplied to him. [90359]

Mr. Hoon: When a British National who is the customer of a tour operator dies overseas, the tour operator's representative normally takes responsibility for the necessary formalities. Our Consular staff provide advice and additional assistance as necessary.

In this case, our Consular staff played a supporting role in liaising with the tour operator's representative, the clinic and the mortuary. They also offered to speak to the police.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what services the Consular Service provides in the event of the death of a British subject abroad. [90358]

Mr. Hoon: The services provided are set out in the Consular Services leaflet "Death Overseas", copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Western Sahara

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans the Government have to send a contingent to the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara. [90438]

Mr. Hoon: We have no plans at present to re-introduce a contingent to MINURSO because of heavy commitments elsewhere. The situation is kept under regular review.

Kuwait

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on the recent elections in Kuwait. [90446]

Mr. Hoon: Elections for Kuwait's 50 seat National Assembly took place on 3 July. Twenty five MPs retained their seats; 16 new members were elected; the remainder being former MPs who have served in earlier parliaments.

Iraq

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent UN Security Council discussions on Iraq. [90445]

Mr. Hoon: Discussions are continuing within the UN Security Council on the various draft resolutions on Iraq. The UK resolution seeks to translate the work of the three UN assessment panels on disarmament, humanitarian and Kuwaiti issues into action. It is now co-sponsored by the Netherlands, Argentina, Brazil, Slovenia, Gambia and Bahrain. We do not consider that the Russian and French draft resolutions offer a realistic basis for agreement in the Council. We are working in the Council to rebuild consensus on Iraq and hope that the remaining Council members will also move quickly to endorse our comprehensive approach.

Sudan

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Sudan concerning the camps which they have set up for people displaced in the civil war in Sudan. [90529]

Mr. Hoon: The return of UK staff to Khartoum, announced on 25 June, will allow us the opportunity to have a dialogue with the Government of Sudan on a whole range of humanitarian issues.

Kosovo

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current security situation in the Kosovo town of Mitrovica. [91231]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: KFOR is tasked with providing robust and even-handed protection for everyone in Kosovo. There has been some tension in Mitrovica where Serbs have tried to keep Kosovo Albanians out of an area of the city. KFOR has been present and escorted a relatively peaceful march through the affected part of the city by 2,000 people on 7 July. Most recently French troops broke up a demonstration on the bridge dividing the two areas on 11 July. KFOR has a strong presence in the area and has kept the situation under control, in line with their mandate under UNSCR 1244 to provide a secure environment for all the people of Kosovo.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) malicious calls and (b) well intended but unfounded calls were made to the Benefit Fraud Hotline in each of the last three years; what was each category as a percentage of the total number of calls; and what was the average cost of investigating each such call. [90448]

Mr. Timms: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 13 July 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked Mr. Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many malicious and well intended but unfounded calls were made to the Benefit Fraud Hotline in the last three years; what was each category as a percentage of the total number of calls; and what was the average cost of investigating each such call. As Mr. Mathison is currently away from the office on annual leave I am replying.

Calls to the Hotline and investigations costs are not collated in the format you have requested. We do not seek to establish the motives and intentions of the caller.

It may be helpful if I explain that from its introduction on 5th August 1996 to March 1999, the Benefit Fraud Hotline has received 550,000 calls. Each case is scrutinised to establish whether a fraud investigation is appropriate. Of the above total 69% have been referred to the relevant fraud section for further action. Of these, 33% resulted in the reduction, cessation or the identification of an overpayment of benefit. The estimated average benefit staving per call was £218.

The Benefits Agency (BA) does not disclose the results of any investigation to any caller to the Hotline. Our aim is to provide a vehicle by which the public can become involved in protecting the benefits system. The BA believes that the Benefit Fraud Hotline provides a valuable and popular service to the public in helping to reduce the level of fraudulent claims.

I hope that this is helpful.

Savings

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the percentages of households with (a) savings of up to £1,000, (b) savings between £1,000 and £20,000, in bands of £1,000 and (c) savings above £20,000; and if he will give the same data for households where the head of household is between 50 and 65 years. [91053]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

Households by amount of savings and where head of household is between 50 and 65-years-old

Notes:

1. The estimates are based on sample counts which have been adjusted for non-response using multi-purpose grossing factors that control for region, Council Tax band and a number of demographic variables. Estimates are subject to sampling error and to variability in non-response.
2. It should be noted that questions on assets are a sensitive part of the FRS questionnaire and have relatively low level of response, and hence a higher level of imputation compare to other parts of the survey. Responses are imputed in around 1 in 10 cases. Past evidence has suggested some under reporting of capital by respondents, and figures for income from these sources for pensioners are lower on the FRS compared to other surveys such as the Family Expenditure Survey.
3. In the 1997–98 Family Resources Survey the head of the household is classified using standard procedures:
In a household containing only husband, wife and children under 16 (and boarders) the husband is always the head of the household.
Similarly, when a couple have been recorded as living together/cohabiting the male partner is treated as the head of the household.

In all situations where there are other relatives in the household where some or all of the household are unrelated; except that a husband always takes precedence, the person in whose name the accommodation is owned or rented is taken as the head.
When the accommodation is supplied with a job or provided rent free for some other reason, the person to whom the accommodation is given in this way becomes the head.
Occasionally more than one person will have equal claim to be the head, in these cases, where they are of the same sec, the oldest is the head; where they are of different sexes, the male is the head.
4. All percentages have been rounded to the nearest integer.

Social Security Administration (Scotland)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) of 6 July 1999, Official Report, columns 506–07, if his estimate assumed that (a) a separate Scottish system would require the provision of new buildings or (b) a separate Scottish system would be denied access to existing computer systems; and if he will make a statement. [90926]

Mr. Timms: No detailed assessment has been made of the costs of administering the Social Security system separately in Scotland. The estimate of £600 million in my previous reply, 6 July 1999, Official Report, columns 506–07, was based on assumptions which were made about the apportionment of the Department's central and fixed costs which include these elements.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the procedural steps for assessing eligibility, reviewing, appealing and making payment of (a) child support allowance, (b) housing benefit, (c) council tax benefit and (d) income support; and which of the offices of his Department and its agencies in Scotland handle each of these steps. [90866]

Mr. Timms: Applications for Child Support in Scotland are administered from the Child Support Agency Centre in Falkirk. Details of the procedure for applying for child maintenance and for review of assessment and appeals are set out in the booklet CSA 2008 "A guide to child support maintenance".

Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit are administered by Local Authorities, or in some cases Scottish Homes in respect of Housing Benefit only. The procedural steps on a claim, including those for assessment, reviews, appeals and payments, are set out in the booklet RR2 "A guide to Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit".

Eligibility to Income Support is assessed and payments are made in each local office of Benefits Agency in Scotland. The steps involved are set out in the booklet IS20, "A guide to Income Support". All aspects of appeals are handled by the Independent Tribunal Service.

Copies of all these documents are in the Library.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Perth (Ms Cunningham) of 6 July 1999, Official Report, columns 506–07, what were the total fixed costs for his Department in the UK; and if he will provide a breakdown by category of these costs for (a) his Department and (b) each relevant agency. [90928]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. The costs of administering the Department and its agencies are set out in the Social Security Departmental Report 1999–2000 (Cm 4214).

Social Fund

Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to publish his annual report on the Social Fund for 1998–99 and the Social Fund Commissioner's annual report. [91644]

Angela Eagle: The Secretary of State's annual report on the Social Fund for 1998–99 (Cm 4351) was published today and has been laid before Parliament.

The report records that total gross expenditure in 1998–99 was £558 million. This included 225,000 non-repayable grants and 1,801,000 interest free loans together worth £501 million and funeral, maternity and cold weather payments totalling £57.2 million. In addition, around 10 million pensioners in over 7 million households received winter fuel payments totalling £200 million.

The Social Fund Commissioner's annual report has also been published today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Executive Agencies (Report and Accounts)

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will make available the 1998–99 annual reports and accounts for each of his Next Steps agencies. [91645]

Mr. Darling: The 1998–99 annual reports and accounts for the Benefits Agency (HC 580), Child Support Agency (HC 533), Information Technology Services Agency (HC 518), War Pensions Agency (HC 527) and Contributions Agency (HC 523) have been laid before Parliament today. The Contributions Agency transferred to the Inland Revenue on 1 April 1999.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Organophosphorous Sheep Dips

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 267, on a report from the Institute of Occupational Medicine on the effects of exposure to organophosphorous sheep dips, when he expects to receive advice from the Veterinary Products Committee; and if he will make a statement. [91660]

Mr. Rooker: I have received advice from the Veterinary Products Committee (VPC) on the implications of the IOM report for marketing authorisations of OPs and, in particular, OP sheep dips. A copy of the VPC's advice has been placed in the Library of the House.

I have accepted the VPC's recommendation that marketing authorisation holders should be asked to submit practical and workable plans to improve and standardise the design of sheep dip containers. If such plans are not submitted within three months, action will be commenced to revoke marketing authorisations.

I have also accepted recommendations on emphasising the importance of handling OP concentrate safely in advice to farmers and in training and the examination which leads to the issue of a Certificate of Competence. We are giving urgent consideration to the recommendation that handlers of OP sheep dip concentrate should be required to hold a Certificate of Competence.

The VPC made it clear that this is interim advice. The VPC will be offering further advice together with COT and the other independent advisory committees before the end of the year.

Quarantine

Mr. Reed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce the outcome of his review of quarantine regulations applying to animals originating from the United States and Canada. [90501]

Mr. Rooker: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Genetically Modified Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, (1) pursuant to his answer of 7 July 1999, Official Report, column 554, if he will list the amounts of glyphosate and aminomethylphosphoric acid in residues of glufosinate-treated conventionally bred soya and genetically modified glyphosate-tolerant soya and the residues of glufosinate in conventionally bred soya and glufosinate and n-acetyl glufosinate in genetically modified varieties treated with glufosinate ammonium; and what the maximum permitted United Kingdom levels of retained residue are for each chemical; [91183]

(2) if he will list the chemical residues retained as a result of crop treatment of (a) imported genetically modified maize and (b) imported non-genetically modified maize; if he will give the amounts of each retained chemical and the current maximum permitted levels for each chemical. [91047]

Mr. Rooker: [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Glyphosate: Experimental studies indicate that two major residues may be found in soya and maize crops treated with glyphosate. The residues concerned are glyphosate itself and its metabolite aminomethylphosphoric acid (AMPA). These two residues occur in both conventionally treated and genetically modified (GM) glyphosate tolerant crops. However, the levels of the metabolite AMPA are generally higher in the GM crops.

The maximum residue level (MRL) permitted for glyphosate in maize in the UK is 0.1 mg/kg. This was the lowest level at which glyphosate could be reliably detected at the time the MRL was set, so represents an effective 'zero'. No MRL has been set for AMPA, as it is of less toxicological significance to humans than glyphosate.

The UK MRL for glyphosate on soya is 20 mg/kg. All maize and soya, including imports of GM and conventional crops, must comply with these MRLs.

The Government carried out monitoring for residues of glyphosate in imported and home produced maize during 1998. The results of this monitoring, including information on the actual levels found, will be published later this year. We are monitoring for residues of glyphosate and its metabolite in soya products during 1999. The results will be published next year.

Glufosinate ammonium: In the case of glufosinate ammonium, the major residue in traditional soya varieties is glufosinate. In GM soya varieties, the major components of the residue are glufosinate and a metabolite n-acetyl glufosinate.

No consent has been given to market genetically modified glufosinate ammonium tolerant soya in Europe, so setting an MRL for n-acetyl glufosinate has not been considered. There are currently no UK statutory MRLs for glufosinate ammonium, but any food treated with glufosinate ammonium must pose no unacceptable risk to consumers under general UK food safety legislation. The Government are monitoring for residues of glufosinate ammonium and its metabolite in soya products during 1999. The results will be published in the year 2000.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent reports he has received from the United States Department of Agriculture on (a) the yields of genetically modified crops grown in the United States and (b) the quantities of chemical treatments used for such crops compared to non-genetically modified crops; and if he will make a statement. [91048]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 13 July 1999]: I have received no such reports from the US Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what comparative assessment his Department has made of the herbicide-residue levels in (a) GM soya and (b) non-GM soya; and if he will make a statement. [90722]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Data on residue levels of the herbicide glyphosate in both traditionally bred and GM soya have been submitted to the EU in support of the Maximum Residue Level (MRL). The data for traditionally bred soya were evaluated by EU experts and assessed by all EU member states, including the UK, by the MRL setting process. Subsequently, the data for GM soya were evaluated. The same MRL was set.

No approval has been given for the marketing of glufosinate ammonium tolerant soya in the UK.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91016]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies should have Green Transport Plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed Green Transport Plans for all our London headquarters buildings and our York building, which houses two of the Ministry's Executive Agencies and we are developing plans for all our other key buildings in line with the targets set out in the White Paper. The plans include measures to reduce single-occupancy car use by employees for commuting and business travel, including extending and encouraging wider use of the Department's video conferencing network and promoting suitable car sharing schemes.

Fishing Discards

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate by area in relation to each species of fish covered by quota, the amount of fish discarded from United Kingdom registered fishing vessels in the last five years; what proportion of, the fish discarded in each case were (a) of a marketable condition and (b) undersized; and if he will make a statement. [90733]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) on 17 June 1999, Official Report, columns 216–18, and 8 July 1999, Official Report, column 626.

Research work is continuing on why fish are discarded.

Glyphosate

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of the use of the herbicide glyphosphate when it is applied to the land as an aid in conservation tillage schemes. [90599]

Mr. Rooker: I believe my hon. Friend is referring to the herbicide glyphosate. All pesticides are subject to strict statutory control and are approved only following thorough scientific evaluation of the risk that they pose to people, wildlife and to the wider environment. Only if this assessment shows that there is no unacceptable risk will approval be granted.

Glyphosate has been approved as a herbicide since 1974. The environmental impact of its use in conservation tillage schemes would have been assessed at that time. Glyphosate is currently being reviewed by the EU Commission and the UK is playing an active part in this work. The review is expected to be completed by about late 2000.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91067]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 322. All questions for a named day up to 14 April 1999 were tabled by 31 March 1999.

Food and Drink Inspections

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those sectors of the food and drink industry which are obliged to pay for the inspection of their products. [R] [90383]

Mr. Rooker: In the food and drink industry, charges are made for the hygiene inspection of meat, milk production and fish. Where export certification is required, the necessary inspections are paid for by the industry. In addition, the industry also pays for the sampling and analysis of food of animal origin for residues of veterinary medicines, and the agrochemical sector pays part of the cost of the pesticide residue monitoring arrangements.

Fruit and Vegetable Disposal

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount spent by the EU on the subsidising of dumping of surplus fruit and vegetables in the most recent year for which figures are available. [90421]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Unpublished EU figures give the total cost of compensation for fruit and vegetables withdrawn from the market as £96.56 million[1] for the financial year ending 15 October 1998.

[1] Source:
EU Commission data, converted from ecu to £ using representative rate on 31 December 1998.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement explaining the total amount spent by the EU on the disposal of fruit and vegetables in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and if he will list the tonnage of each particular fruit and vegetable so disposed of. [90422]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The Government have no wish to see good food go to waste and have consistently opposed the system of paying compensation for produce withdrawn from the market, arguing that it distorts the market and encourages surpluses. The reform of the EU fruit and vegetable regime in 1996 was a step in the right direction, providing for reductions in withdrawal prices and volumes withdrawn over the first six years of the reform. The reform also encouraged greater use of free distribution to charities and other non-profit making institutions. A considerable amount of produce withdrawn in the UK has been distributed to such bodies in the past year.

Provisional quantities of each product withdrawn in the EU during the 1997–98 marketing years

	Tonnes

Dairy Hygiene Inspection Charges

Mr. Todd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the levels of dairy hygiene inspection charges, or equivalent, levied in each European Union member state in sterling. [90856]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested is not currently available. I have asked for inquiries to be made about charges in other member states and I will write to my hon. Friend when I have further information.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many invitations (a) he and (b) the Minister have received to visit slaughterhouses since their appointments; and how many each has visited. [88337]

Mr. Nick Brown [pursuant to his reply, 7 July 1999, c. 554]: My hon. Friend the Minister of State has visited slaughterhouses on nine occasions since 1 May 1997.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Directors

4. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress he has made in implementing his policies relating to the activities of company directors. [90010]

Mr. Wilson: We have embarked on a fundamental review of company law, and two reviews of insolvency law are also being undertaken. However, we need to balance giving company directors maximum freedom to perform their duties with providing the public and business with protection against the activities of rogue directors. Over 2,500 unfit directors have been disqualified by the courts in the last two years.

Clean Coal Technology

6. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current progress of clean coal technology for generating electricity. [90012]

Mr. Battle: On 22 April, I announced the launch of Energy Paper 67 on Cleaner Coal Technologies. At the time, I stated that my Department was allocating £12 million over the next three years towards a new research and development programme on cleaner coal technology, expecting that this money will generate some £60 million of collaborative industry and university projects over the period.

Out-of-town Supermarkets

14. Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has assessed of the relationship between the location of out-of-town supermarkets and competition between their owners. [90022]

Mr. Byers: The Competition Commission is currently investigating the supply of groceries in the UK. It is due to deliver its report on 7 April 2000. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on matters which may form part of the Commission's inquiry.

Manufacturing Exports

15. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has further to promote manufacturing exports. [90023]

Mr. Wilson: I hope that all exporters, including manufacturers, will benefit from British Trade International. A wide range of support is available to manufacturing exporters. I am continuing to meet manufacturing companies throughout the UK in order to ensure that we are fully in touch with their needs and concerns.

Objective 1 Funding

16. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations his Department has received on the application of the additionality principle in regard to Objective 1 funding; and if he will make a statement. [90024]

Mr. Wills: The Department has received one written representation on the application of additionality for the coming Objective 1 programmes; the issue has also been raised on several occasions with officials.

The UK complies with the rules on additionality and will continue to do so. For Objective 1, additionality will be calculated for all Objective 1 regions taken together, as required under Article 11 of the new Structural Funds regulation.

Assisted Area Status

17. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make an announcement on the new map of assisted area status. [90025]

32. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will review the arrangements for the allocation of regional selective assistance. [90041]

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his proposals for the new assisted areas. [91661]

Mr. Byers: I am today submitting to the European Commission the UK Government's proposals for Assisted Areas under Article 87(3)a and 87(3)c of the EC Treaty.

A document explaining our protocols will be placed in the Library of the House and a copy will be sent to each hon. Member to inform him or her of our proposals. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland will write to the devolved Administrations setting out the proposals for Wales and Scotland.

Difficult Markets

18. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress in respect of good projects in difficult markets. [90026]

Mr. Wilson: Since announcing the "Good Projects in Difficult Markets" scheme in August last year, ECGD has been asked to consider supporting around 40 projects in 18 countries with a potential UK export value in excess of £2 billion. Negotiations on a number of these projects are progressing well.

Dairy Industry

19. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the market in raw milk. [90027]

36. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the prospects for the dairy industry. [90045]

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about competition in the dairy industry. [90015]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry published on 6 July the former MMC's report on the supply in Great Britain of raw cows milk. I refer Members to the Secretary of State's speech given during the Dairy Industry debate on 7 July 1999, Official Report, column 1090–91.

Working Time Regulations

20. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the effect on small businesses of the working time regulations. [90028]

Mr. Wills: A Regulatory Impact Assessment on the costs and benefits resulting from the implementation of the Working Time Regulations, which considers small business, was made prior to implementation.

We are presently consulting on amendments which are designed to clarify the regulations and help business without removing the protection that the Directive provides to workers.

Copies of both the Regulatory Impact Assessment and the consultation documents are held in the Library of the House.

National Minimum Wage

21. Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to ensure that employers are complying with the national minimum wage. [90029]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) today, column 557.

22. Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the implementation of the national minimum wage for care home employees. [90030]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have made no such assessment. The Government has asked the Low Pay Commission to monitor and evaluate the introduction and impact of the national minimum wage and to report by December. The Commission's terms of reference specifically require it to consider the impact on low-paying sectors and I understand that it has recently written to interested parties, including representatives of employers and employees in the care sector, inviting them to submit written evidence.

New Businesses

23. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to assist a wider range of people to establish businesses. [90031]

Mr. Wills: The Government is assisting a wider range of people to establish businesses by promoting a stable macro-economic climate with price stability, low interest rates and flexibility on the supply side. The Secretary of State has also announced that we will establish the Small Business Service to improve support services for small businesses. A consultation document on the Small Business Service was published on 1 July.

We envisage a key element of the Small Business Service to be to offer help to a wide range of people, including those wishing to become self-employed, and to encourage enterprise in socially and economically disadvantaged communities. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has recently appointed Lord Trotman to consider, over the summer, what more the Government can do to help encourage the foundation and growth of small firms. The review will look at the measures taken so far to support small and medium-sized enterprises, covering both tax and public spending programmes.

Wind Energy

24. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the benefits of schemes to support wind energy. [90032]

Mr. Battle: Wind energy is one of the more promising renewable energy sources for electricity generation world-wide. The supporting analysis accompanying my renewables consultation paper includes a status report on wind energy and how the technology has been developing in the UK, highlighting the achievements of wind energy projects under the Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation (NFFO) and the supporting Research and Development Programme.

At 31 March 1999, there were 59 wind projects comprising 138 Mega Watts (Declared Net Capacity) operational in the UK. The cost of wind-generated electricity under successive NFFO orders has reduced significantly, with the average price having fallen from 7.98 p/kWh under NFFO-1 to 2.88 p/KWh under NFFO-5, substantially increasing both competitiveness and growth of renewables.

Electronic Commerce

25. Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to bring forward his legislative proposals for electronic commerce. [90033]

Mr. Wills: The Government is ready to introduce the Electronic Communications Bill into Parliament. However, the Government is currently seeking agreement to the use of the carryover procedure for this Bill.

Small Business Service

26. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what ways the proposed Small Business Service will help to reduce compliance costs for small businesses. [90034]

Mr. Wills: The Small Business Service will have a clear task to help reduce the burden of regulation on small firms wherever possible. It will work closely with the Regulatory Impact Unit to ensure that the impact of proposed regulations on small business is properly understood and considered at all levels of Government. It will work to ensure that small businesses have access to clear and straightforward information and guidance on regulatory requirements. It will also aim to identify practical ways in which it can help smaller business to cope with regulation.

The Government's proposals are set out in detail in the consultation document on the Small Business Service published on 30 June, copies of which have been placed in the Library of the House.

Climate Change Levy

27. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the cost to business of the proposals for new energy taxes. [90036]

28. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the impact of the climate change levy on business. [90037]

Mr. Battle: I welcome the representations from so many quarters of industry and business that something must be done to tackle climate change and to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases.

The new climate change levy is intended to encourage energy efficiency in business and to contribute towards our commitments to reduce greenhouse emissions.

Any assessment of the impact of the levy will depend on the final rates of tax which are set by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. HM Customs and Excise has previously published a consultation document on the design of the levy, which included some rates, but for illustrative purposes only.

The Government has promised that there will be significantly lower rates of levy for those energy intensive sectors, covered by the EU Integrated Pollution Prevention and Control Directive, which are prepared to enter negotiated agreements with the Government to deliver energy efficiency improvements and/or emissions reduction targets. Discussions with a number of energy intensive sectors are under way to develop outline negotiated agreements for their sectors.

The Government is determined to work closely with business on the detailed design and implementation of the climate change levy, and will take final decisions in the light of the responses to the Customs and Excise consultation as well as representations received from business and others.

Oftel

29. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the responsibilities of Oftel. [90038]

Mr. Wills: The Government's review of utility regulation has examined telecoms regulation and the responsibilities of Oftel. The proposals for new legislation on utility regulation, which will be introduced at the earliest possible opportunity, include giving Oftel a new primary duty to protect the interests of consumers and extending Oftel's duties to address the interests of low income users and the chronically sick. In addition, the Government is committed to a wider ranging reform of telecoms regulation and we expect to publish initial proposals later in the year. We are also working closely with Oftel on the 1999 Review of EC telecoms legislation, which will lead to a new telecoms regulatory framework in the EC early in the next century.

Employment Directives

31. Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's estimate of the cost of the (a) social chapter's parental leave directive, (b) works councils directive and (c) part-time workers directive to British business. [90040]

Mr. Ian McCartney: On the question of the estimated costs of the Directives on Parental Leave and Part Time Workers, I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer given to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) on 17 June 1999, Official Report, column 204.

The Regulatory Impact Assessment for the European Works Councils Directive was published as part of the consultation exercise on the implementation on 1 July. It estimated the recurring compliance costs to business to be £14.5 million.

Consumer Protection

33. Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's work on consumer protection. [90042]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be making a statement shortly on the Government's consumer White Paper.

Metrication (Food Industry)

34. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on metrication in the United Kingdom retail food industry. [90043]

Dr. Howells: The sale of retail food in metric units of measurement began in 1973. About 90 per cent. of retail food is now sold in metric weights or measures.

Under legislation made in 1994, foods sold loose by weight must be priced and weighed in grams and kilograms after 31 December 1999. Retailers will be able to display the weight and price in imperial units alongside their metric equivalents. Consumers will be able to describe in imperial weights the quantity they wish to buy. The retailer will simply provide the equivalent metric quantity.

I intend soon to report more fully to Parliament on metrication in the UK, including the Government's plans to provide small retailers and their customers with information and advice about the changeover for loose goods.

Petrol Service Station Licensing Agreements

35. Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received on licensing agreements in the petrol service station industry. [90044]

Dr. Howells: My Department has received a number of representations about licensing agreements in the petrol service station industry.

Mains Electricity

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide grants to support the generation of electricity from renewable energy sources by households without mains electricity; and if he will make a statement. [89852]

Mr. Battle: The Government's consultation paper "New and Renewable Energy—Prospects for the 21st Century" invited views on the balance of measures and precise form of support for renewables in their next stage of development. I am currently considering responses to the consultation exercise and I will publish a summary of these shortly. I will take these responses into account in drawing up policy proposals for further support measures.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what quantities of irradiated spent research reactor fuel from the Spanish reactors (a) Jen-I, (b) Argos and (c) Arbi, have been imported for reprocessing at Dounreay since 1992; what safeguards agreements cover this spent fuel; what quantities have been reprocessed to date; what contractual commitments exist to return the (i) radioactive wastes, (ii) uranium and (iii) plutonium arising to Spain; and what quantities of reprocessing arisings have been returned to Spain to date. [91169]

Mr. Battle: This is an operational matter for the UKAEA. I have asked the Chairman of the UKAEA for this information and his reply will be placed in the Library of the House.

Research Councils (Environmental Performance)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who has responsibility within the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils for environmental performance; and if they are subject to performance-related pay. [91009]

Mr. Battle: Overall responsibility is held by the Deputy Chief Executive, Dr. Gordon Walker. A senior member of staff, Dr. Richard Wade, has been appointed to carry forward and implement environment policy. The particular issue of radioactive emissions is dealt with by another senior officer, Dr. Tim Broome.

All CCLRC staff are subject to performance related pay.

Small Businesses

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the Government will implement the proposal in the Competitiveness White Paper to support the growth of smaller businesses in areas with particular needs. [91662]

Mr. Byers: I am today announcing the introduction of Enterprise Grant Areas in England.

Details of these areas are set out in the document explaining our proposals for Assisted Areas under Article 87(3)a and Article 87(3)c of the EC Treaty.

A copy of this document will be placed in the Library of the House.

Motorsport Engineering

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the contribution of motorsport engineering to UK manufacturing competitiveness. [90008]

Mr. Battle: The reputation of British motorsport engineering is world class. The demanding engineering and materials solutions required at the leading edge of this sport bring opportunities for technology transfer and other more mainstream industrial sectors, such as aerospace and vehicle production, have benefited from this.

Company Accounts

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the operation of company law in the matter of (a) frequency of registering accounts and (b) penalties for late registration of accounts in relation to (i) trading and (ii) non-trading companies. [91300]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The periods allowed for delivering accounts to the Registrar of Companies will be reviewed as part of the fundamental review of company law, which the Department launched in March 1998. It is due to present its final report in the Spring of 2001. Separately, Companies House is reviewing whether the current penalty bands which apply to the late filing of accounts are having the maximum effect in encouraging compliance. The penalties apply equally to trading and non-trading companies.

Car Industry

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what financial support his Department has given the car industry since May 1997. [90013]

Mr. Byers: DTI financial support is provided through Regional Selective Assistance (RSA). RSA grants totalling £71,742,000 have been made by the Department to the car industry since May 1997. This figure covers support given to both vehicle manufacturers and component suppliers.

British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons the right hon. Member for Fylde was not advised directly on 13 July of his Department's future proposals for BNFL's financial arrangements. [91710]

Mr. Byers: I understand that BNFL wrote to MPs with a constituency interest in the company about the announcement on 13 July. I have also written offering them further briefing about the announcement if they would find that helpful.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency in 1999–2000. [91772]

Mr. Paul Murphy: For 1999–2000, the following key performance targets have been set for the Agency:

90–100 per cent. of key Government users of the Agency surveyed rating its overall service as satisfactory or better, with 50–55 per cent. rating it as very satisfactory.

95–100 per cent. of registered non-Government users of the Agency surveyed rating its overall service as satisfactory or better, with 55–60 per cent. rating it as very satisfactory.

To produce no fewer than 60 statistical publications and 16 ad hoc research publications during 1999–2000.

95–100 per cent. of NISRA readers rating key publications as satisfactory or better, 40–45 per cent. rating them as very satisfactory.

To process 98 per cent. of postal and personal applications for General Register Office certificates within eight and three working days respectively.

To carry out and evaluate a Census Rehearsal.

To achieve a minimum of 3 per cent. efficiency saving.

Full details are set out in the Agency's Corporate and Business Plan, copies of which will be placed in the Library of the House.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by her Department since June 1997. [90536]

Mr. Paul Murphy: In terms of the Northern Ireland Civil Service (NICS), since 1985 detailed monitoring of the workforce has been undertaken in terms of gender, religion and disability. The NICS is currently collecting, for the first time, data on disability to align with the provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. The outcomes of monitoring have been reported in the published reports of the Service's Equal Opportunity Unit, the first of which was published in 1986. The most recent report, the Sixth Report, was published in 1997 and it is intended to publish a Seventh Report later this year. Copies of the Reports are available in the Library of the House.

Since 1991, Home Civil Servants (HCS) working in the Northern Ireland Office, London, have required monitoring for ethnic origin. HCS staff have also been monitored in terms of gender and disability; and for staff working in Northern Ireland, community background.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for each of the London education authorities the number of pupils who were excluded from school on 11 June. [90172]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on exclusions is collected only on an annual basis. The latest available information in the form requested is for the academic year 1997–98 and is shown in the following table.

Religious Education

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what considerations have been given to including Koranic teaching in schools under religious education sections in the National Curriculum. [90306]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Religious education is required to be included, alongside the National Curriculum, as part of the basic curriculum. It has equal standing in relation to the National Curriculum subjects within a school's curriculum.

It is for the Local Education Authority to convene an agreed syllabus conference for the purpose of preparing an agreed syllabus for religious education. The local education authority shall appoint constituent bodies consisting of persons representing such Christian denominations and other religions and denominations of such religions as, in the opinion of the authority, will appropriately reflect the principal religious traditions in the area. The role of a conference is to produce and recommend an agreed syllabus for religious education which meets fully the requirements of the 1988 Act and is educationally sound. Its recommendation must be unanimously agreed by the committees constituting the conference.

The Department issued Circular 1/94 Religious Education and Collective Worship that sets out the statutory position and gives guidance to governors, local education authorities and standing advisory committees on religious education on how to carry out their functions in regard to religious education.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many inquiries he has received about petitions for ballots on the future status of grammar schools. [91202]

Ms Estelle Morris: A number of inquiries have been made about petitions but no central log has been made of these. The ballot administration company has received formal requests to calculate the number of signatures required for any petitions submitted by 31 July in order to trigger a ballot for the following areas: Barnet, Birmingham, Kingston-upon-Thames, and Ripon. To date, no petitions have been sent to the ballot company for checking and no ballots have taken place or are scheduled to take place.

School Pupils (Drug Possessions)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of pupils found to be in possession of controlled drugs on school premises in the last year for which figures are available. [91132]

Mr. Charles Clarke: These figures are not centrally available. However, we have asked local education authorities to provide us with information on the number of drug related exclusions of more than five school days in the current school year. This information should be available early next year.

Class Sizes (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average class size of state schools within the Greater London area. [90773]

Ms Estelle Morris: Provisional figures show that the average class size for classes taught by one teacher in maintained primary and secondary schools in Greater London as at January 1999 are 27.3 and 21.8 respectively.

Young People (Leicestershire)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of 17 to 18-year-olds in Leicestershire are in (a) schools, (b) further education and (c) work. [91207]

Mr. Mudie: In 1996–97, the proportion of young people aged 16 or 17 at the start of the academic year, in full or part-time education in schools and further education in Leicestershire, were 34 per cent. and 44 per cent. respectively.

The proportion of young people aged 16 or 17 at the start of the academic year, in employment, in the winter of 1998, in Leicestershire was 68 per cent.

Many young people combine work with education so there are significant overlaps between these groups.

New Deal (Private Sector Companies)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the performance of private sector companies delivering the New Deal. [91205]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is still early days, but progress in the 10 New Deal for Young People Private Sector-led Units of Delivery appears to be generally satisfactory. They are subject to the same evaluation and continuous improvement strategy as other units. As part of this, ES and its partners are working together to improve performance in the delivery of the New Deal. Private Sector-led Units of Delivery are no exception, and ES will shortly be undertaking a series of comprehensive contract review meetings with these partners. It is too early to make reliable assessments of performance for the New Deal 25+ Pilots.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91020]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Information on business travel is not collected in the form requested. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target for all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions to have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed plans covering our five headquarters buildings. The Employment Service have also completed a plan covering their headquarters and main buildings. We are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with the targets set out in the White Paper. The plans include measures to reduce single occupancy car use by employees for commuting and business travel.

School Transport

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has issued to local authorities about charging parents for school transport to the nearest denominational school to their home. [91291]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department has issued no specific guidance on charges for transport to denominational schools as this is for Local Education Authorities to consider in the light of local circumstances. General guidance on the duties and powers of Local Education Authorities with regard to school transport is contained in a letter from the Department to Chief Education Officers dated 21 January 1994.

National Disability Council

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the National Disability Council will report on its activities during the 1998–99 financial year. [91823]

Ms Hodge: I am pleased to announce that the Secretary of State has today laid the National Disability Council's fourth annual report before Parliament. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Ancient Monuments

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on how many occasions and in what circumstances English Heritage has exercised its powers to take control of an ancient monument. [89400]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 2 July 1999]: English Heritage does not have powers to take control of an ancient monument in the sense of a compulsory acquisition. Its management of historic sites and properties arises under the direction of myself, or through acquisition or Guardianship arrangements entered into by agreement.

Archaeology

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will set out the responsibilities of English Heritage in relation to local government archaeological services. [89404]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 2 July 1999]: English Heritage has policy responsibility for advising Local Authorities on the adequacy of their archaeological services; more specifically it assists with the funding of archaeological posts in local authorities connected with data gathering and the maintenance of Sites and Monuments Records (a contribution of £164,752 in 1999–2000). It also funds survey work, totalling £387,876 in 1999/2000; provides archaeological planning advice to the Greater London Boroughs; provides eight scientific advisers to assist local authorities' archaeological curators (with a ninth post due to be filled shortly); and funds an administrative support post for the Association of Local Government Archaeological Officers.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people were employed in local government archaeological services (a) in 1990 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available. [89403]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 2 July 1999]: A 'RESCUE' (The British Archaeological Trust) survey in 1990 indicated that 1,021 people were employed in local government archaeological services in that year; I understand that a forthcoming report by the Institute of Field Archaeologists and the Council for British Archaeology will show that, at September 1998, 795 people were employed. The reduction partly reflects the increase in the provision of private sector archaeological services following the publication in 1990 of Planning Policy Guidance Note 16—Archaeology and Planning.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment regarding the development of NVQs in archaeology. [89414]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 2 July 1999]: None, but the relevance of NVQs to archaeology is one of the issues being considered by English Heritage and archaeological bodies within English Heritage's Training Liaison Forum.

Team Sports (Women's Participation)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment the Sports Council has made of the opportunities available to girls and young women to take part in previously mostly male team sports; and what plans it has to expand those opportunities. [91054]

Mr. Banks: Sport England works with a range of organisations, including the Women's Sports Foundation, to promote and encourage opportunities for girls and young women in sport at all levels.

Sport England regularly commissions research into sporting participation patterns and trends and will be carrying out its Young People and Sport survey later this year, which will focus specifically on the participation rates of girls in sport.

Projects developed with Lottery funding are monitored to assess the participation levels of previously under-represented groups. Gender-specific targets have been set in the document developed by Sport England entitled "England, the Sporting Nation" and targets for increasing the participation rates for women in sport are being developed in line with the new Funding Agreement with this Department.

As part of its aim to raise the participation rates of girls in sport, Sport England has undertaken a pilot initiative, 'Girl Sport', and hopes to begin introducing the initiative nationwide later this year.

Any governing body which receives funding from Sport England must provide development proposals for women's sport as a condition of that funding. Also, all organisations applying for funding from the National Lottery Sports Fund are required to include ways of encouraging the participation of women and girls. This is now helping to increase participation levels, particularly in those sports that have traditionally been male-dominated.

Sport England has also organised gender equity training for governing bodies, including senior executives.

Specific activities that Sport England has undertaken with governing bodies of sports that have been traditionally male-dominated include:

providing financial support for a women's development officer for rugby league; encouraging women's sections of rugby union clubs;

helping to facilitate the amalgamation of male and female governing bodies in football and cricket, with the result of additional resources for the development of the women's game, with girls' age-group national teams formally established.

Where the men's professional game is ineligible for lottery revenue support through the 'World Class Performance' programme, Sport England are still able to support women's elite sport in cricket and rugby union.

We are hopeful that the establishment of the UKSI National Network will also prove extremely beneficial to women's sport.

Sports Grounds (Safety)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what measures he plans to introduce to improve safety and facilities at cricket and rugby grounds. [91210]

Mr. Banks: The Government are determined that spectators of all sports should be able to enjoy the action in safety and comfort. In April I announced new roles for both Sport England and the Football Licensing Authority in our drive to modernise sports grounds across the country. Sport England is to fund a £10m improvement scheme over the next four years to help top rugby league and rugby union teams, and the major cricket counties to improve safety at their grounds. In addition, the Football Licensing Authority will be reconstituted as the Sports Grounds Safety Authority and will have an advisory role on safety issues associated with all sports which use outdoor sports stadia, including cricket. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that these are welcome development.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90824]

Mr. Chris Smith: Since June 1997 my Department has commissioned two internal staff surveys, one on ethnicity and one on disability.

Social Exclusion Unit

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will publish the report of the Social Exclusion Unit's Neighbourhood Renewal Policy Action Team 10 on arts and sport; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [91860]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Government warmly welcome the report of Policy Action Team 10, set up by the Social Exclusion Unit to look at the contribution arts and sport can make to neighbourhood renewal. The Team was led by my Department and its report shows how participation in the arts and sport can develop individuals' talents and self-confidence, encourage collective effort and contribute to improvements in health and educational achievement and reductions in crime and unemployment. The report will be published tomorrow morning and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Cinemas

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with representatives of the small cinema industry about the viability of independent cinemas; and if he will make a statement. [91431]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department has received no recent representations on this issue from representatives of the small cinema industry. The Government are keen to encourage the growth of a diverse, successful British film industry in which a wide range of film-makers, distributors and exhibitors can flourish. This will be one of the key aims of the new Film Council, to be established by 1 April 2000.

Film Council

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the findings of Lord Attenborough's inquiry into the structure and remit of the Film Council. [91433]

Mr. Chris Smith: Following an extensive, open consultation exercise, which showed that there was strong support for the proposed Film Council, I asked Lord Attenborough for his personal views and advice on the proposals, given his unrivalled breadth of experience of the British film industry over many years. It was never intended that Lord Attenborough would produce a report for publication. However, I took his advice into account before making a final announcement on the establishment of the new body, at the Cannes Festival in May.

Film Companies

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the applications for the franchises to operate National Lottery-funded film companies. [91434]

Mr. Chris Smith: Applications for Lottery-funded franchises were made to the Arts Council of England and contained information of a commercially sensitive nature. The Arts Council of England has therefore decided not to publish the applications.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Low-income Countries

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent discussions she has had with her European counterparts with regard to increasing the proportion of EU assistance which is invested in low-income countries. [91301]

Mr. Foulkes: I have recently agreed with my Irish, Swedish and Dutch counterparts a joint message to the European Commission asking it to bring forward proposals for increasing the proportion of EC official development assistance to low-income countries each year from 2000–06, with the aim of the proportion reaching 70 per cent. by 2006.

World Trade Organisation

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will set out her priorities for the forthcoming World Trade Organisation Round with regard to improving market access to developing countries. [91302]

Mr. Foulkes: The Government's objectives for the proposed Millennium Round of negotiations are set out in the Minister of Trade's answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Mr. Stunell) of 21 January 1999, Official Report, column 548–49. The priority for the forthcoming World Trade Organisation meeting in Seattle is to launch a comprehensive set of negotiations which will, among other things, enable developing countries to make solid and substantial gains. A key part of this is the opportunity that broad-based negotiations will offer developing countries to significantly improve their access to markets.

Agriculture and textiles are particularly important areas for developing countries. The 1994 agreement on Agriculture in the WTO contains a commitment to continue the reform process started in the Uruguay round by further reducing support and promotion for trade in agriculture. The UK actively supports further progress in this area. We will also be vigilant in ensuring the EU's full implementation of the agreement to abolish quotas on textiles and clothing, and will seek an acceleration of this. In the forthcoming Millennium Round of trade negotiations, the UK and the EU are advocating a comprehensive tariff negotiation aiming at reducing tariffs, removing all tariff peaks and at harmonising the tariff structures of all WTO members across all non-agricultural products.

The Government also strongly supports the EU's proposal that WTO members should agree at Seattle to provide duty free access for essentially all products from the Least Developed countries no later than the end of the round.

Debt Relief

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the impact which the debt relief measures proposed at the Cologne summit will have on individual countries. [91304]

Mr. Foulkes: The debt relief measures agreed at Cologne were based on aggregate figures. It is too early to assess with precision the impact of the Cologne proposals for each of the HIPC countries. The impact in each case will depend on the economic circumstance of the country at the time, the precise manner in which the debt relief is delivered and, for some countries, up-to-date information on their total indebtedness. For the many countries still to be assessed for HIPC relief, the estimate of their total indebtedness is uncertain, and the nature of their debt is not fully known. We are pressing the World Bank and IMF to provide information, including on various options for delivering debt relief, and the timeframe over which the costs of these would fall. We are also pressing the World Bank and the IMF to speed up the process by which countries are assessed for debt relief, so that three-quarters of countries will have reached their Decision Point by the end of the year 2000.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she had with (a) her European counterparts and (b) the European Commission on the proposal that unspent European Development Funds should be invested in debt relief. [91305]

Mr. Foulkes: The Chancellor of the Exchequer and I wrote to Commissioners Pinheiro and Marin in April urging them to consider ways in which the EC could contribute more to debt relief, including by using uncommitted European Development Funds for this purpose. I raised this issue again at the Development Council on 21 May and the Chancellor discussed it with his counterparts at the Economic and Financial Affairs Council (ECOFIN) on 12 July. The Commission has told us that they will bring forward specific proposals, in response to our request, later in the year.

Kosovo Refugees

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the long-term needs of families in Albania which have provided accommodation for Kosovo refugees. [91303]

Mr. Foulkes: We recognise and applaud the generosity of the Albanian people in hosting about 440,000 refugees. Throughout the crisis, the Department for International Development (DFID) has supported NGOs to run a range of activities with long-term benefits for the host communities in Albania, such as improvements to water, sanitation, health and education facilities. A DFID scoping mission visited Albania in May to assess the needs of host communities and refugees. As many refugees have now returned to Kosovo, we are discussing the future of these programmes with the responsible humanitarian assistance agencies.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by her Department since June 1997. [90533]

Mr. Foulkes: Statistics on employment by gender and ethnic origin have, from this year, been published in our Annual Report. These series were maintained but not published in earlier years. We have within the last year undertaken a survey of staff who are suffering from disabilities, and statistics will be included in the next Annual Report. No new data series on age has been commissioned pending the acquisition of a personnel management database system.

CABINET OFFICE

Senior Salaries Review Board

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what is the level of the lowest salary currently set by recommendation of the Senior Salaries Review Board. [91517]

Mr. Kilfoyle: £17,560, which the Senior Salaries Review Board recommended for Junior Ministers in the Scottish Parliament, in addition to their salary as Members of the Scottish Parliament.

Government Car Service

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many Government Car Service cars if run as privately owned private/light goods vehicles would qualify for the lower rate of vehicle excise duty. [91524]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Government Car and Despatch Agency. I have asked its Chief Executive, Mr. Nick Matheson, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Nick Matheson to Mr. Shaun Woodward, dated 15 July 1999:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me in my capacity as Chief Executive of the Government Car and Despatch Agency to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of Government Car Service vehicles that could qualify for lower vehicle excise duty.

This Agency has no cars which would qualify for the lowest rate of vehicle excise duty if they were operated privately.

People's Panel

Gillian Merron: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when he intends to publish results from the third wave of research using the People's Panel; and if he will make a statement. [91864]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The third wave of results from the People's Panel looks at: what levels of services people expect from public agencies, and where they would like to obtain them from; where people live and the housing they live in; helping children learn to read; and gas safety. The results also include other research carried out using the Panel, notably on attitudes to biosciences which was first published on 21 May. I have today placed in the Libraries of the House copies of the results from this third wave of research.

Property Advisers

Mr. Singh: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what targets he has set for the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate for 1999–2000. [91865]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have set PACE the following targets for 1999–2000:

1. To identify savings from proposals to be agreed with departments for the co-ordination of property activities on the Civil Estate which in net present value terms should be at least 12 times the agency's related running costs;
2. To deliver on time at least 93 per cent. of the Central Advice Unit's annual work plan;
3. To recover 100 per cent. of the costs of providing intelligent client services and to increase the percentage of all the agency's running costs recovered to 12 per cent.;
4. To dispose of 68 freeholds and leaseholds and to maintain expenditure and receipts within the voted provision;
5. To achieve an improvement in overall customer satisfaction for the agency's services.

Central Office of Information

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what performance targets he has approved for the Central Office of Information for 1999–2000. [91866]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have approved the following key performance targets for Central Office of Information for 1999–2000:

1. To achieve a financial surplus of £0.1 million on an accruals basis;
2. To achieve efficiency improvements of a unit cost reduction of 2 per cent.;
3. To achieve a customer satisfaction index of 8.25 (out of 10).

Civil Service College

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what performance targets he has approved for the Civil Service College for 1999–2000. [91862]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have approved the following key performance targets for the Civil Service College:

1. To achieve financial breakeven on an accruals basis;
2. To generate an income on consultancy of £1.1 million;
3. To have 1,900 students from the Senior Civil Service;
4. To have 900 students from the private sector;
5. To achieve 89 per cent. of course evaluations by students in the top two boxes of a six box scale.

DEFENCE

Weapons Exports

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence from which budget the Paveway III bombs, supplied to Saudi Arabia, were paid for; and to which other countries the JP 233 Runway Denial Systems have been exported. [90435]

Mr. George Robertson: The cost of the Paveway III bombs gifted to Saudi Arabia will be met from the defence budget. JP233 has been exported only to Saudi Arabia.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review the arrangements for the movement of nuclear weapons in the United Kingdom following the RAF's relinquishing of its nuclear capability. [91863]

Mr. Doug Henderson: On 1 April 1999 the Chief of Defence Logistics (CDL) assumed overall responsibility for the movement of nuclear weapons in the United Kingdom. The responsibility for the day-to-day movement of nuclear weapons is being moved, in phases, from RAF personnel to the Ministry of Defence Police with support from AWE civilians and the Royal Marines. An Implementation Team has been established to manage the transfer, which will be completed by 31 March 2002. The process will occur gradually in recognition of the importance and complexity of the task and the MOD will continue to maintain the highest levels of safety and security during convoy operations.

European Armament Policy

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the mandate and activities of the EU Working Group on European Armament Policy. [90434]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The Ad Hoc EU Working Party on a European Armaments Policy (POLARM) was established by COREPER in July 1995 to consider a report produced by governmental experts and see if work should be taken forward within the EU. Since December 1997, POLARM has considered a draft common position on framing a European armaments policy on which there has been no agreement to date.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Espionage (Russia)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the current espionage threat level from Russia. [89609]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 2 July 1999]: In accordance with her Majesty's Government's long-standing policy, I cannot comment on intelligence matters.

UN Civilian Administration (Kosovo)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of UN personnel earmarked for the UN civilian administration in Kosovo; how many UN personnel have been recruited for the UN civilian administration in Kosovo; and how many UN personnel earmarked for the UN civilian administration in Kosovo have already been deployed. [90128]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United Nations is planning to deploy 3,200 international police personnel to Kosovo and has received pledges for 2,400 officers. The UN is not yet in a position to provide detailed information on its overall staffing requirements for the Interim Civil Administration or on the number of personnel so far recruited. It is still in the process of identifying and recruiting qualified personnel from within the UN itself, from other international organisations and from member states. As of 5 July, the UN had 257 staff on the ground in Kosovo.

Panel 2000

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 30 June 1999, Official Report, column 168, on Panel 2000, if he will list the progress which has been made in respect of each of the recommendations listed. [90499]

Mr. Hoon: I shall write to the hon. Member with details of the progress which has been made on each of the Panel 2000 recommendations listed in my answer of 30 June 1999, Official Report, column 168.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times Ministers in his Department have held meetings with ministers and officials of the Irish Government since 1 January, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting, the Ministers involved and the names of the Irish ministers and officials at each meeting. [90411]

Mr. Robin Cook: There has been one formal bilateral meeting of a Foreign Office Minister with an Irish Minister since 1 January 1999. The Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), met Ms Sile de Valera, Irish Minister for Arts, Culture, the Gaeltacht (Irish speaking area) and the Islands, in the FCO on 17 June. Irish officials in attendance were Mr. Tadgh O'hEalaithe, Secretary General of the Department of Arts; Mr. Geoffrey Keating, First Secretary, Irish Embassy; and Ms Sheila Clifford, Ms de Valera's personal assistant.

I have regularly met the Irish Foreign Minister, David Andrews, at EU Councils, including the monthly meetings of the General Affairs Council, and have often held exchanges with him in the margins.

Technical Co-operation Training Places

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the Department for International Development's reduction of the number of technical co-operation training places available in the UK on his Department's operations in developing countries. [90633]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The Department for International Development have advised us that the Pre-service and In-service Training budget for Technical Co-operation has increased between 1996–97 and 1998–99 and is expected to rise further in 1999–2000. The number of technical co-operation training places under the Associate Professional Officer Scheme is also expected to increase.

Montenegro

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made on the proposals for constitutional reform in Montenegro; and if he will make a statement. [91243]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have not made representations on constitutional reform in Montenegro. We have underlined our support for democracy in Montenegro. Our goal is to see democratic principles and values flourish throughout the FRY.

Balkans

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what security guarantees have been provided by NATO to states in the Balkan region and their neighbours since the end of the Kosovo conflict; and if he will make a statement. [91228]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No new security undertakings have been made by NATO to states in the Balkan region, nor to their neighbours, since the end of the Kosovo conflict. The Secretary General of NATO reiterated in his letter of 29 June to the Foreign Minister of Macedonia, Mr. Dimitrov that

> "the security of [Macedonia] remains of a direct and material concern to the Alliance".

During the air campaign, Mr. Solana made clear in his letters to frontline Partner states that > "it would be unacceptable for the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to threaten [their] territorial integrity, political independence or security".

We are committed to promoting long-term security and stability throughout the Balkan region. We are working bilaterally, and with partners and Allies in the Stability Pact and NATO's South East Europe Initiative, to build democracy, security and mutual confidence among the countries of the region.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made recently on the issue of land seizures in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [91246]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have discussed land reform in Zimbabwe when I met President Mugabe on 5 July. The Government supports the principle of land reform, provided that the process is transparent, fair and sustainable; and welcomes the Zimbabwe government's adoption of the Inception Phase for land resettlement agreed with donors, stakeholders and beneficiaries at a conference in September 1998.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what contact he has had with the leader of the Democratic Party of Serbia since the end of the conflict in Kosovo; [91233]

(2) what contacts the United Kingdom Government have had with the leaders of Serbian opposition parties since the end of the conflict in Kosovo. [91234]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I both met the leader of the Democratic Party of Serbia, Zoran Djindjic, in London on 22 June.

Bosnia-Herzegovina

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the postponement of local elections in Bosnia-Herzegovina. [91229]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Ambassador Robert Barry, Chairman of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation's Provisional Election Commission for Bosnia and Herzegovina (PEC) announced on 24 June that, given the political situation in Bosnia, the PEC had decided to postpone forthcoming municipal elections in Bosnia until 8 April 2000. The PEC made the decision following consultations with representatives of the Bosnian political parties and other elected officials, the Peace Implementation Council established in accordance with the Dayton Peace Agreement and the OSCE.

The PEC has emphasised that the decision will not affect voter registration within Bosnia and Herzegovina or out-of-country which is continuing according to schedule.

Non-proliferation Policy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what non-proliferation assessments have been conducted by his Department over the past 12 months; and if he will place copies in the Library. [91247]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Before any decision is taken on non-proliferation policy, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office assesses and takes into account all relevant factors. Such assessments are covered by Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Internal discussion and advice). The Foreign and Commonwealth Office also contributes to assessments made elsewhere in the Government.

Kosovo

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if arrangements are to be made by his Department for a delegation of hon. Members, apart from the Foreign Affairs Committee, to visit Kosovo. [91424]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There are currently no arrangements in hand by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for Parliamentary delegations to visit Kosovo.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Single Currency

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Attorney-General how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) forecasts that it will incur in the future, on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91168]

The Attorney-General: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Departments are considering what preparations may be necessary.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the new measures he announced in his oral statement of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 1371–73, on biotechnology will enable some commercial planting of genetically modified crops to take place with Government approval. [86128]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The new measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office in his statement of 21 May were the SCIMAC (Supply Chain Initiative on Modified Agricultural Crops) Code of Practice and Guidelines. General planting of GM crops can take place only with Government approval. At present, no genetically modified (GM) crops have all the necessary approvals for general cultivation.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answers of 22 March 1999, Official Report, columns 41–42, and 16 June 1999, Official Report, columns 135–36, on Parliamentary Scrutiny of Draft Directive 90/220 concerning powers of the Council of Ministers and Commission of the European Community to determine rules for the deliberate release into the environment of genetically-modified organisms; when the relevant draft was debated in the House; and how the directive differed from the draft then considered. [88688]

Mr. Meacher: The position of the Government with regard to the original Commission proposal for the amendment of Directive 90/220 has been laid out in Explanatory Memorandum 6378/98, submitted to the House of Commons on 23 March 1998. I wrote to the House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee on 27 November with further details of the Government's priorities in the negotiations, and the Explanatory Memorandum was debated in the House of Commons European Standing Committee A on 24 March 1999.

The Government submitted a further Explanatory Memorandum (7138/99) on 30 April following the publication of the Commission's amended proposal taking account of the European Parliament's Opinion. The Committee responded in its Nineteenth Report, acknowledging that the main issues had been thoroughly discussed, but seeking the Government's view on a number of outstanding issues. I responded to these points by letter on 22 June.

There were only two points on which the text agreed at Council differed from the position which the Government had laid out before the Committee. The time limitation of consents was fixed at a maximum of ten years for first marketing consents. This was above the Commission's proposal of seven years, but below the European Parliament's proposal of twelve years. Differentiated procedures were also deleted from Part C of the Directive which relates to marketing consents. The possibility of introducing differentiated procedures will be considered by the Commission as part of its review of the Directive in 2003.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 22 June 1999, Official Report, column 334, on genetically modified oilseed rape, when an application to release genetically modified crops on East Lodge Farm, Stanton, Gloucestershire was made; and when the applicant was notified of the outcome. [89747]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 July 1999]: Three consents have been issued in respect of East Lodge Farm, all in respect of genetically modified (GM) winter oilseed rape. Although the farm itself is inside the Gloucestershire boundary, the applications and consents refer to East Lodge Farm as being in Stanton, near Broadway, Worcestershire. The details of the consents are as follows:

Reference	Applicant	Application date	Consent issued
R30/3	CPB Twyford Ltd.	12 February 1998	15 June 1998
R15/24	Plant Genetic Systems	16 February 1998	10 July 1998
R22/6	Monsanto plc	20 June 1996	6 August 1996

Aircraft Safety

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make his Department responsible for monitoring the response to, and actions following, the safety recommendations made by its Air Accident Investigation Branch; and if he will make a statement. [90416]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Air Accident Investigation Branch and the CAA's Safety Regulation Group are independent of each other. Legislation requires investigation of aviation accidents and serious incidents to be carried out by an organisation independent of the regulator. It is the responsibility of the Safety Regulation Group to maintain and enhance standards of aviation safety, taking into account among other things recommendations made by the Air Accident Investigation Branch.

Capital Investment Programme

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list his Department's capital investment programme for the years 1996 to 2002 under the headings (a) railways, (b) national motorway and trunk road network and (c) local transport. [90963]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions Departmental Investment Strategy, published in April 1999, set out the major elements of public sector investment anticipated as a result of the resources allocated to the Department following the comprehensive spending review. The following table illustrates capital investment generated through and related to the DETR programmes and policies for railways, national motorway and trunk roads, and local transport. investment prior to 1998–99 is given as an average figure.

£ million

	(a) Railways[1]	(b) Motorways and trunk roads[1]	(c) Local transport
Average 1993–94 to 1997–98	n/a	1,457	894
1998–99	1,900	1,121	623
1999–2000	2,894	1,119	641
2000–01	2,612	1,166	724
2001–02	2,555	1,245	1,016

Rural Public Transport

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much Government money has been invested in initiatives to improve rural public transport in (a) Bath and North East Somerset and (b) South Gloucestershire, since May 1997. [91159]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In his March 1998 Budget, the Chancellor made available an additional £50 million a year to assist public transport in rural areas. The bulk of these extra resources is being used to provide additional bus services. We allocated £139,970 to Bath and North East Somerset and £191,415 to South Gloucestershire in Rural Bus Subsidy Grant for 1998–99. We have allocated the same amounts to both authorities for 1999–2000. In addition, both authorities submitted successful bids under the 1998 Rural Bus Challenge competition. Bath and North East Somerset were allocated £34,600 for a project to improve lighting at bus stops in rural areas, while South Gloucestershire were allocated £612,000 for a project to develop three community transport co-ordination centres.

Bull Bars

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy in respect of the addition of bull bars to motor vehicles. [90728]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Following a consultation exercise on the possibility of taking action on the bull bar issue, we are now in the process of identifying how best to take matters forward. As a part of this process we have asked the Transport Research Laboratory to do some test work comparing a range of bull bars and base vehicles.

We are also awaiting the opportunity to examine the detail of a European Commission proposal for a pedestrian protection Directive, which we understand will be put forward later this year. As well as making car fronts safer, such a Directive could provide a Europe-wide mechanism for preventing aggressive bull bars being fitted to vehicles to make them more pedestrian friendly. Increasing the pedestrian friendliness of cars has the potential to reduce significantly the numbers of vulnerable road users who are killed and injured each year.

Car Tax Evasion

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives his Department has introduced to reduce car tax evasion on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement on their progress. [91211]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The main responsibility for enforcement action against unlicensed vehicles rests with the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency. The police and traffic wardens in the Merseyside area provide the Agency with reports on unlicensed vehicles seen on the public road. Last year, the Agency took successful enforcement action against some 25,000 evaders in the Merseyside area, bringing in over £2.9 million in fines and penalties. In addition, the Agency and the police conduct campaigns periodically against road tax evaders. These take the form of extensive localised publicity to encourage motorists to relicense their vehicles, or risk being caught in subsequent police checks. The last such campaign in Merseyside was run in March of this year, and resulted in around £0.3 million recovered in additional revenue.

The Agency also operates a permanent wheelclamping operation in Merseyside as part of a national scheme. The scheme has proved to be very successful in encouraging motorists to relicense their vehicles. Since its introduction in Merseyside in November 1997, almost 2,000 vehicles have been clamped. Some 50 per cent. of these have been left unclaimed and disposed of. The initial publicity of the scheme led to the recover of £0.5 million in additional revenue.

Further initiatives aimed at reducing the level of vehicle excise duty evasion include measures to improve the quality of the vehicle register and to make it more difficult for motorists to drop out of the licensing system. Planning is being done for the introduction of camera systems in Merseyside and the rest of the country to detect and deter evasion.

Maritime and Coastguard Agency

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the Maritime and Coastguard Agency's letter of 24 June (ref. FA00059) to Mr. G. S. Wright in respect of payment for a survey for seaworthiness made on 8 March, if he will refund the overpayment outstanding together with interest; and if he will make a statement on the factors underlying the delay in repayment. [90834]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 14 July 1999]: The Survey was carried out on 6, 7 and 20 April 1999 and was completed on 18 May 1999 on the production of Mr. Wright's Radio Certificate.

The refund was then issued on 29 June 1999 and cashed on 7 July. I can confirm that the delay was due to an administrative error whereby the survey cheque was posted to an incorrect account. Should a claim for interest be made in writing it will be calculated as per current legislation.

Computerised Vehicle Routeing

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance on computerised vehicle routeing and scheduling software he intends to produce. [91445]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We intend to publish a guide on Computerised Vehicle Routeing and Scheduling (CVRS) later this summer. It is being produced by the Energy Efficiency Best Practice Programme and will inform transport managers of the benefits of CVRS. The guide will summarise the general capabilities of CVRS systems and show how they can be used to avoid wasted mileage and reduce fuel consumption. It will also present some short case studies in order to demonstrate the savings that can be achieved.

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what he expects to be the salary of London Assembly members when they first meet. [91493]

Mr. Raynsford: We have invited the Senior Salaries Review Body to make recommendations about the initial levels of salary of the Mayor of London and members of the London Assembly. the Review Body is due to report by December this year, and we will announce our decision when we have had an opportunity to consider its recommendations.

Aeroplane Noise

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many meetings Ministers have had with (a) officials and (b) others regarding the draft Aeroplane Noise (Amendment) Regulations 1999. [91052]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 14 July 1999]: None. The draft Aeroplane Noise (Amendment) Regulations are simply an administrative measure. They align UK legislation with the latest EU amendment by deleting 11 aeroplanes which no longer qualify for exemption.

Household Waste

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of household waste from Greater London is (a) recycled, (b) incinerated and (c) taken to landfill sites. [91499]

Mr. Meale: The table gives the proportion of municipal waste collected in Greater London in 1997–98, which was recycled, incinerated or sent to landfill.

	Percentage
Municipal waste recycled	5.5
Municipal waste incinerated	18.7
Municipal waste taken to landfill sites	75.8

Source:
DETR/WO Municipal Waste Survey

Eighty-two per cent. of municipal waste collected in London in 1997–98 was household waste, and 5.7 per cent. of this was recycled. Separate figures for the proportions of household waste sent to incineration or landfill are not available.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what functions of Training and Enterprise Councils will be taken over by the Regional Development Agencies when TECs are abolished. [91502]

Mr. Meale: Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) will not be taking over any of the functions currently performed by TECs. From April 2001, the Learning and Skills Council for England will assume responsibility from TECs for funding Modern Apprenticeships, National Traineeships and other government-funded training for young people and workforce development. RDAs will work closely with the Learning and Skills Councils at local and national levels. The Learning and Skills Council will be responsible for setting a national post-16 Learning and Skills Strategy which will draw on and support the RDAs' regional strategies and skills action plans. RDAs will be represented on the boards of the national and local Learning and Skills Councils.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Regional Development Agencies will determine the boundaries of local Learning and Skills Councils; and whom they must consult beforehand. [91503]

Mr. Meale: Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) will advise Government, by 30 September, on the boundaries for the local Learning and Skills Councils and the local outlets of the Small Business Service after consulting their public and private sector partners.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Civil Service code of conduct applies to employees of Regional Development Agencies. [91514]

Mr. Meale: No. Regional Development Agencies are required to have in place a code of guidance for staff based on the "Model Code for Staff of Executive Non-Departmental Public Bodies", produced by the Cabinet Office.

Single Regeneration Budget

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will make an announcement about successful bids under round five of the Single Regeneration Budget. [91664]

Mr. Prescott: I have announced today details of the successful bids under Round 5 of the Single Regeneration Budget. Brief descriptions of the successful bids in their region have been sent to hon. Members in English constituencies. Full copies of the bid documents for successful bids by region will be held for inspection at the relevant Regional Development Agency and the Government Office for London.

SRB Round 5 operated under bidding guidance issued in September 1998. Subject to finalising the details of the successful bids, the availability of resources, and the satisfactory agreement and implementation of partnerships' Delivery Plans, we intend to make available over £1 billion of funding for 163 successful bids, which include proposals to address key priorities such as social exclusion, education, employment and training, community safety and prevention of drug misuse.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many Single Regeneration Budget funded projects are underway in each of the Government office regions of England. [91510]

Mr. Meale: There are 517 SRB schemes currently operating in England. Information on the number of projects involved in each scheme is not held centrally. The following is the number of schemes by Government office region:

Government office region	Number
Eastern	25
East Midlands	39
London	121
North East	53
North West	94
South East	43
South West	45
West Midlands	48
Yorkshire and the Humber	49
Total	517

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister announced today a further 163 winning schemes under SRB Round 5.

Landfill Sites (Mink Carcasses)

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the landfill sites that have received mink carcasses in 1999 from (a) Windmill Farm, Blandford Forum, (b) Childe Okeford, (c) Crow Hill, Ringwood, (d) Buntshill Farm, Prochfield, (e) Cornyhaugh, Ponteland, (f) Sprotborough, (g) Kelbain, Onneley, (h) Swalesmoor, Boothtown, (i) Daisy Barn Farm, Longridge and (j) Woodview Farm, Bradworthy, indicating the farm from which the carcass originated in each case. [90073]

Mr. Meale: The Environment Agency, which licenses and monitors landfill sites, does not collect data showing which sites have received mink carcasses.

Oxford Transport Strategy

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the Oxford Transport Strategy. [91426]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Excluding petitions and representations about the removal of the old LMS railway building, in the last year DETR has received some 22 pieces of correspondence regarding the Oxford Transport Strategy. Of these 18 have been from members of the public (including a petition letter signed by 12 people), and 4 from Members of Parliament.

Regional Chambers

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many voluntary regional chambers he has recognised as regional chambers for the purposes of the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998. [91515]

Mr. Meale: We have designated four regional chambers under the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998, they are:

the East Midlands Regional Assembly

the North East Regional Chamber

the North West Regional Assembly

the West Midlands Regional Chamber.

London Underground

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the funding of London Underground. [91867]

Mr. Prescott: I promised that we would modernise London's Underground for passengers and deliver the funding it needs. I am keeping that promise.

Two years age we inherited an investment backlog of £1.2 billion, a massive cutback in grant, and a badly-planned Jubilee Line Extension draining away funds from the rest of the network.

Last year we announced plans for a Public/Private Partnership to secure the long-term future of the Underground, put in place new management arrangements for the Jubilee Line, and put in an extra £365 million of grant, fully restoring the cuts made by the previous Government.

We are today allocating £517 million of additional resources for investment in London Transport over two years. With the grant already allocated, and with LT's own revenues and investment through PFI deals, this means that we are investing over £1.6 billion on the Underground this year and next. More than £500 million a year will be spent on the core Underground system.

This core investment programme cannot deliver a transformation overnight—years of neglect cannot be quickly overturned. But it does ensure that there will be real improvements for passengers over the next two years. It will deliver the stability of funding the Underground needs until the completion of the PPP contracts, which will give long-term security of investment.

To deliver improved service to customers, the Underground needs investment and effective management. I have made it a condition of providing this additional funding that London Transport improves its performance and uses its resources effectively. We appointed a new Chairman, Sir Malcolm Bates, earlier this year, and we are further strengthening the Board. I shall be monitoring London Transport's performance closely to ensure that they deliver.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ministerial Meetings (Irish Government)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Council how many times she has held meetings with Ministers and officials of the Irish Government since 1 January 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting and the names of the Irish Ministers and officials at each meeting. [90832]

Mrs. Beckett: None.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioner Incomes

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 624, by what year he plans to ensure that all those who have worked and contributed throughout their lives will receive on retirement an income above the means-tested threshold; and what is his definition of lifetime in this context. [90820]

Mr. Timms: By 2038, everyone who has worked and contributed throughout their working life will receive on retirement a state pension above the level of the Minimum Income Guarantee.

A full working life for SERPS and State Second Pension purposes is 49 years.

Notes:

1. Earnings are assumed to grow 1.5 per cent. faster than prices.

2. The State Second Pension is assumed to be introduced in 2002.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), of 6 May 1999, Official Report, column 457, on pensioner incomes, what would be the difference in income between a single man of 65 years with no savings or resources and the income of a single man of 65 years who has resources of at least £16,000, assuming that both men have the median income from SERPS for all newly retired pensioners; and what amount of money would be required to purchase an annuity to fund this difference, if the housing benefit and council tax benefit received as the average amount paid to those aged 60 years or over receiving income support and housing benefit, and if the annuity were inflation-linked; and if he will give the same figures for two women at 60 years. [90515]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

	Men aged 65
Difference in income per week in circumstances specified	20
Lump sum required to purchase equivalent annuity	14,000

Notes:

1. Information on SERPS awards by marital status is not available. For men, the median award for all men aged 65 has been taken as a proxy for single men aged 65. For women, it would not be appropriate to take the median award for all women aged 60 as a proxy for single women aged 60 as many recently retired married women had opted out of SERPS by paying the married women's reduced rate of NI contributions.

2. All figures are rounded to the nearest pound.

3. Totals may not sum due to rounding.

4. The annuity rates used are for 5 per cent. Limited Price Indexation. This is an annuity where the payments are uprated each year in line with inflation up to maximum of 5 per cent.

5. Figures for average eligible rent/Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit relating to May 1997 were taken from Social Security Statistics 1998. These averages are for all benefit recipients, including single pensioners and pensioner couples.

6. Figures for median SERPS were taken from a 5 per cent. sample of Department of Social Security records as at 31 March 1999.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90828]

Mr. Timms: Since 1997, the Department and its agencies have commissioned two staff attitude surveys separated by gender, race, disability and age. Additionally, two specific surveys, one on disability and one on ethnicity, have also been carried out.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the expenditure implications of the changes in the contributions conditions of Incapacity Benefit proposed in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill. [90767]

Mr. Bayley: The proposed reform of the Incapacity Benefit contribution conditions, which will ensure that the benefit goes primarily to people who have recently been in work and paying national insurance contributions, is estimated to reduce benefit expenditure by £25 million in the first year, £60 million in the third year and £150 million after 10 years.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the proportion of current recipients of Incapacity Benefit who would not have met the contributions conditions proposed in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill. [90768]

Mr. Bayley: Since existing Incapacity Benefit recipients will not be affected by the proposed new contribution conditions, no estimate has been made of the proportion of all current recipients who would have failed to meet those conditions. However, available data suggest that around 10 per cent. of recent awards of Incapacity Benefit would not have been made under the proposed contribution conditions.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which Benefits Agency office would handle (a) provision of advice and information, (b) assessment of eligibility of the claim, (c) review of the claim, (d) appeal relating to the claim, (e) payment of the benefit and (f) recovery of overpaid benefit for a person living in Elgin and claiming Incapacity Benefit. [90865]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Incapacity Benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Margaret Ewing, dated 14 July 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent question asking which Benefits Agency (BA) office would handle (a) provision of advice and information, (b) assessment of eligibility of the claim, (c) review of the claim, (d) appeal relating to the claim, (e) payment of the benefit and (f) recovery of over-paid benefit for a person living in Elgin and claiming incapacity benefit (IB).

The provision of advice, information, assessment and review of claims and the payment of benefit for persons claiming IB and living in Elgin is handled by the Benefits Office, Trinity Road, Elgin.

Appeals relating to IB are dealt with at Glasgow City Benefits Office, Pitt Street, Glasgow, whilst overpayment recovery work is handled by the Benefits Office, Castle St, Stornoway.

I hope this is helpful.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the current situation in respect of the award of disability benefit to Penn Wooding of Brixham, Devon; and what plans he has to clarify the instruction on form DLA 434 sections 2 and 2A with reference to the rubric relating to changes in circumstance. [90833]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Mr. Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Anthony Steen, dated 14 July 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question if he will review the current situation in respect of the award of disability benefit to Penn Wooding of Brixham, Devon; and what plans he has to clarify the instruction on form DLA 434 sections 2 and 2A with reference to the rubric relating to changes in circumstance.

I can confirm that the review of Mr. Wooding's entitlement to the care component has been completed. The existing entitlement ends on 31 July 1999, and entitlement at the higher rate has been awarded from 1 August 1999 for an indefinite period. The decision was notified to Mr. Wooding on 8 July. Mr. Wooding's existing entitlement to the mobility component at the higher rate remains unchanged.

The instruction on Sections 2 and 2A of claim form DLA 434 is included so that customers who apply for a renewal of entitlement, and whose needs remain unchanged, do not need to complete a [illegible] sections. However, adjudication officers are responsible for deciding what evidence is necessary to determine entitlement and have the authority to ask for further information if there is some doubt about the available evidence.

Our procedures and forms are kept under review. In addition, the Disability Living Allowance Modernisation Programme aims to improve and modernise delivery of the benefit, including redesigning procedures and claim forms. The matters raised by your question will be taken into account in developing an improved service.

In view of the nature of Mr. Wooding's condition, he should not have been asked to provide any further information. I regret that this occurred and I apologise to Mr. Wooding for this error.

Remote Access Terminals

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the location and number of Remote Access Terminals for local authorities in Scotland; if it is possible to restrict local authorities' access to information relating only to claimants in their own local authority area; and if he will make a statement. [91200]

Angela Eagle: The local authorities in Scotland who have Remote AccessTerminals (RATs) are listed. In total, 29 RATs are installed in 26 authorities and a further two authorities have now applied for installation. RATs provide relevant data from Income Support or Jobseeker's Allowance claims that are, or have been, made from addresses within the relevant local authority area. Local authorities have no access to details of claims unless an address within their boundary is recorded on the claim.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how long an employee made redundant has to wait before becoming entitled to claim Jobseeker's Allowance; what other benefits are available during this period; if the same time limit applies if the employee has to make a claim to the Redundancy Board; what plans he has to review this system; and if he will make a statement. [91427]

Angela Eagle: The length of time a redundant employee has to wait before he becomes entitled to Jobseeker's Allowance depends on what payments he is due from his ex-employer. Any holiday pay payable within four weeks of the termination of employment or pay-in-lieu of notice will remove entitlement for an equivalent period to that in respect of which the payment was made. Lump sum statutory redundancy payments do not affect contribution-based JSA but may affect income-based JSA. The rules which apply if the redundant employee is due, but does not receive, these payments from his ex-employer and has to claim compensation from the Redundancy Payments Service have the same effect.

The availability of other benefits during this period will depend on the individual's circumstances. For those who have not received the monies due from their ex-employer, there are safeguards to protect those most in need: payments of JSA can be made if hardship would otherwise result.

We have no immediate plans to review the rules for those who receive payments from their ex-employers. We are, however, aware of the effect of the JSA rules on those who do not receive the monies due from their ex-employers and are considering the matter in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Industry to see whether any changes can be made. There are, however, complex issues to be resolved.

Scottish Parliament

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if statements he made during the Scottish Parliament elections relating to the costs of a separate Scottish social security administration were made in his official capacity as Secretary of State for Social Security; and if he will make a statement. [90945]

Mr. Darling: All my contributions to the Scottish Parliamentary election campaign were made in my capacity as a member of the Labour Party, but informed by my experience as a Government Minister.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Passport Agency

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the summary of the Passport Agency business review undertaken in 1997; and if he will make a statement. [90682]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Yes. I have placed a summary of the business case for Private Sector Involvement in the Issue of the British Passport, produced by the United Kingdom Passport Agency in July 1997, in the Library.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the options considered by his Department and the Passport Agency for dealing with the current problems at the Agency; and if he will make a statement. [90687]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It would not be appropriate to list all of the options considered for dealing with the current problems at the Passport Agency. This is a matter of internal discussion between myself and Agency officials. The options that have been implemented are the prioritisation of applications based on travel dates; 400 additional staff have been recruited; the Agency is working extended hours; examination processes have been streamlined and straightforward renewal applications are being exceptionally extended by passport offices and main post offices; adverts have been placed in the national and regional media advising the general public awaiting or applying for a passport what to do; and a special telephone helpline for inquiries has been set up.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results obtained from the pilot tests on the new information technology systems introduced by the Passport Agency at the Liverpool and Newport offices; and if he will make a statement. [90685]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The new Passport Application Support System (PASS) is owned, managed and controlled by Siemens Business Services (SBS) under a public–private partnership agreement. The tests carried out at the time of the pilot implementations in Liverpool and Newport were designed and documented by SBS. Agency staff reviewed, agreed and took part in test programmes, but ownership of test documentation rests with SBS, who are free to publish the documentation at their own commercial discretion. The Passport Agency is satisfied with the design and resilience of the PASS Information Technology system, although it will continue with SBS to seek improvement. The Agency will also seek to develop better working arrangements with SBS in passport offices to ensure SBS can deliver an effective operational service.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date his Department made the decision to permit the recruitment of 300 extra staff for the Passport Agency; on what date recruitment of new staff began; and how many of those staff have been fully trained; how many of the additional 100 new staff have been recruited and trained; and if he will make a statement. [90589]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The decision to recruit 300 more staff was taken in late March. Waiting lists from previous campaigns were used to appoint new staff quickly and further recruitment began on 12 April. The 300 staff have been trained to undertake the required duties. Of the further 100 staff, 90 are now in place and have received full training in the required duties. The remainder are due to start by 12 July.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results of the consultation with the Passport Agency user group about the introduction of separate child passports; and if he will make a statement. [90683]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Yes. I have placed copies of the individual responses to the Passport Agency's consultation exercise on separate passports for children in the Library. Members of the Consultative Panel of Passport Users, who comprise of national representatives of the travel trade, consumer groups and other relevant organisations including Re-unite—the National Council for Abducted Children—were consulted on the question of separate passports for children. The broad conclusion of the Panel was that overall security would be improved by the introduction of the requirement for separate passports, and the change would be a positive one.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the contractual arrangements for the imposition of penalties on the contractors responsible for the introduction of new information technology systems at the Passport Agency; and if he will make a statement. [90590]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under the Passport Agency's contracts with Siemens Business Services (SBS) and Security Printing and Systems (SP&S) formerly The Stationery Office Ltd., service credits are available in relation to timeliness of delivery of data to the United Kingdom Passport Agency (UKPA); accuracy of data when delivered to the UKPA; transmission of data to printers; timeliness in printing the passport; system availability; and accuracy of the manufactured product.

Service Credits of £66,951 have so far been levied on SBS for system availability (£47,232) and accuracy of data passed to the Agency (£19,696). Service credits of £4,489 have been levied on SP&S for accuracy of the manufactured product.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish his Department's papers relating to the decision to require a separate children's passport from October 1998; and if he will make a statement. [90684]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It would not be appropriate to publish the policy advice that officials have provided to Ministers. The reasons for introducing the requirement for separate passports for children were announced to the House in my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), 7 April 1998, Official Report, column 173, and there has also been widespread publicity including press releases, information to travel agents, libraries and Citizen Advice Bureaus, and via electronic media, to provide the public with the background to the change. Copies of the individual responses to the Passport Agency's consultation exercise on separate passports for children have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate the Passport Agency and the Home Office have made of the cost of meeting compensation claims resulting from the problems at the Passport Agency; what assessment they have made of the amount which will have to be found from increases in charges made by the Passport Agency; and if he will make a statement. [90688]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is not possible at this stage in the year for the Agency to make a reliable estimate of the complete cost of compensation payments. In the 1998–99 financial year the Agency paid around £80,000 in compensation. In the first four months of this financial year the Agency has paid around £37,000. In terms of the impact on the passport fee, if the Agency's total compensation bill in 1999–2000 is £100,000, this would represent 2p of the £21 passport fee. There is, therefore, no reason why any increase in passport fee should result from the level of compensation.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many outstanding asylum applications remained unprocessed from (i) the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, (ii) Iraq, (iii) Somalia and (iv) Afghanistan on 30 June; and if he will make a statement. [90576]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is estimated that as at the end of March 1999, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of asylum applications awaiting an initial decision for nationals of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was 9,540; Iraq 1,920; Somalia 4,900; and Afghanistan 2,325.

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications were processed in (a) May and (b) June, from (i) the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, (ii) Iraq and (iii) Somalia; how many of these were (1) agreed and (2) refused; and if he will make a statement. [90575]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The available information is given in the table. I regret that information for June is not available until the statistics are published on the Home Office website on the 26 July.

Youth Justice

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the planned optimum ratio of staff to young offenders in all juvenile secure accommodation as envisaged by the Youth Justice Board in its planned reform of juvenile secure accommodation. [91011]

Mr. Boateng: The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales has provided initial advice on the reform of juvenile secure accommodation referred to in my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), 8 March 1999, Official Report, columns 28–29. A copy is in the Library. The advice does not set out an optimum ratio of staff to young offenders, but it does reflect the Board's view that secure facilities should have sufficient experienced and qualified staff on duty at any time to provide regimes geared towards preventing offending by children and young people.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the designated areas which (a) did not have a youth justice team in place and (b) had not appointed a youth offending team manager as at 30 June. [91080]

Mr. Boateng: Section 39 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 required local authorities with social services and education responsibilities to establish youth offending teams in partnership with the police, probation service and health authorities. They will replace existing youth justice teams. The Government expect to implement the provisions nationwide in April 2000.

The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales understands that, so far, youth offending team managers have been appointed for 125 of the 171 relevant local authority areas. In each case the manager has already established a team or is in the process of doing so. Individual authorities are given in the table. Further details of the teams are available on the Youth Justice Board's website at www.youth-justice-board.gov.uk.

Racial Harassment (Merseyside)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints of racial harassment have been received by Merseyside Police Authority since May 1997; and how many complaints have been upheld. [90771]

Mr. Boateng: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. Data are collected centrally on a financial year basis for racial discrimination. In the 12 months from April 1997 to March 1998, 23 complaints of racial discrimination against Merseyside Police were completed. Seven complaints required formal investigation, but none were upheld. Of the remaining 16 completed complaints, three were withdrawn, five informally resolved and eight granted dispensations by the Police Complaints Authority.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to improve the efficiency and increase the output of the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [90848]

Kate Hoey: The Commission is responsible for making efficient use of the financial provision my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary makes for it, and for performing its functions effectively. In the Business Plan for 1999–2000 that it has submitted to him for agreement, the Commission sets out its plans to meet two key challenges: to minimise the delay in reviewing applications from persons in custody, and to increase the number of cases completed per year. Earlier this year, we allocated substantial additional funding to the Commission to enable it to increase its output, and have agreed to a further review of the Commission's resource requirements at the end of this year.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what performance targets are being proposed by his Department for the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [90849]

Kate Hoey: In the Business Plan for 1999–2000 that it has submitted to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for agreement, the Commission has proposed the goals of completing 1,000 cases this year, having 500 under detailed review, and ensuring that the average time an applicant in custody waits for detailed review of their case to begin is not more than 12 months. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is currently considering the Business Plan.

Electoral Procedures

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the report of his Department's ministerial working party on electoral procedures will be published; and if he will make a statement. [90990]

Mr. George Howarth: On 13 July, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary placed a summary of the Working Party's final recommendations in the Library. He will publish the full report later this summer.

Cleveland Police

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 26 April 1999, Official Report, column 77, on Cleveland Police, when he expects the total legal costs to be available; if he will publish them; and if he will make a statement. [91170]

Mr. Boateng: The total legal costs for this case are still not available.

Negotiations are on-going and the final costs are not expected to be determined until the end of July.

Wormwood Scrubs

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been detained under Immigration Act powers in Wormwood Scrubs Prison since March 1997. [90867]

Mr. George Howarth: On 31 May 1999, a total of 10 persons were held under the Immigration Act 1971 at Wormwood Scrubs prison. Information on the number of initial receptions of such detainees into Wormwood Scrubs prison during each month since March 1997 is given in the table.

[1] Provisional figures

Jill Dando

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time police officers are involved in investigating the murder of Jill Dando; and if he will make a statement. [90743]

Kate Hoey: The investigation of crime within the Metropolitan Police District is an operational matter for the Commissioner. He tells me that as at 13 July, there were 46 police officers and seven civilian support staff employed full-time on the investigation, with none part-time. These figures exclude work by scientific, investigative and logistical support staff on the investigation of the murder.

Firearms

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of cases of compensation for hand guns in Leicestershire; and what is the total cost. [91209]

Mr. Boateng: 3,094 handguns were surrendered in Leicestershire and 691 compensation claims have been received in respect of these handguns and associated ancillary equipment. A total of £1,912,175.68 has been paid.

Prisoners

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the number of those serving a prison sentence who have spent time as children in local authority care. [91208]

Mr. George Howarth: The National Prison Survey 1991 (Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, HMSO, 1992) contained the estimate that 26 per cent. of prisoners currently in the prison population had been taken into care before the age of 16.

Public Safety Radio Communications Project

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received to date from police authorities in relation to the cost of the Public Safety Radio Communications Project. [91138]

Mr. Boateng: I have received a letter from the Association of Police Authorities supporting the Public Safety Radio Communications Project, while expressing concerns about affordability. Individual Police Authorities have also written to local Members of Parliament and, to date, I have received letters from Bedfordshire, Derbyshire, Essex, Kent, Norfolk, North Yorkshire, South Yorkshire, West Yorkshire and Wiltshire.

Police Manpower

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers of 30 June 1999, Official Report, columns 183–85, concerning provisional police manpower figures for March, if he will publish for each police authority in England and Wales (a) validated figures showing the number of officers in each force as at 31 March, (b) the changes since March 1998, (c) the percentage changes in their budget and in the numbers of officers between 1 April 1998 and 31 March 1999 and (d) the overall number of police officers and civilian support staff at the latest available date; and if he will make a statement. [91904]

Mr. Straw: The information requested is set out in the tables.

The total number of police officers in England and Wales at 31 March, taking account of officers seconded outside of their forces, was 126,096. This represents a reduction of 677 officers (0.5 per cent.) since March 1998.

Between March 1992 and March 1999, the number of civilian support staff increased by 5,695 to 53,031.

Freedom of Information Draft Bill

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his statement to the House on 24 May 1999, Official Report, columns 21–34, when he intends to publish the background papers leading to the publication of the Freedom of Information Draft Bill; and if he will make a statement. [91422]

Mr. Straw: I have placed copies of the background papers in the Library today. I have also made arrangements for the papers to be available on the Home Office website as soon as possible.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91056]

Mr. Vaz: According to departmental records, 465 parliamentary questions for written answer on a named day were tabled to the Lord Chancellor's Department between May 1997 and 14 April 1998; of these, 420, or over 90 per cent., received a substantial reply on that day.

Single Currency

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) forecasts that it will incur in the future on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91167]

Mr. Vaz: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

Loughborough County Court

Mr. Reed: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he plans to review the impact of the closure of Loughborough County Court on Leicester and Nottingham County Courts. [91174]

Mr. Vaz: The performance of all courts on the Nottingham Group is monitored monthly. Nottingham County Court has felt no impact following the closure of Loughborough County Court. The majority of work and all resources moved to Leicester County Court. However, the overall volume of work at Leicester has not risen significantly.

Legal Aid

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the differences in the level of provision in each United Kingdom region from the not-for-profit sector contractors in community legal services; and what account has taken of this in the allocation of moneys to each region from the Legal Aid Board for provision of not-for-profit contracts. [90979]

Mr. Vaz: The Lord Chancellor has agreed that £20 million should be set aside for contracts to support the development of the not-for-profit sector as providers within the Community Legal Service, and that this sum should be viewed as a floor and not a ceiling. As an initial guide, the Legal Aid Board divided the £20 million between its 13 administrative areas on the basis of the number of income support claimants in each area. However, legal aid areas are not constrained by their initial allocations, and the total amount allocated to not-for-profit organisations nationally may exceed the £20 million set aside for contracts with the not-for-profit sector.

It was the responsibility of each Regional Legal Services Committee (RLSC) to assess the need for legal services in its own region. To determine the need for contracts, each RLSC then considered what services were already being supplied by the not-for-profit sector as a whole within its region, other than work being undertaken under the legal aid scheme, including under pilot contracts with the Legal Aid Board. Some RLSCs decided that, because insufficient information was available on the quality and amount of work done by non-contracted not-for-profit organisations in their region, some of these services should not be taken into account when determining the need for contracts.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what criteria the Regional Legal Services Committee uses to identify the level of need for legal services in respect of housing, immigration and employment matters in Rochdale; what formula they used to assess the level of resources to meet this need in per capita terms; and what steps his Department has taken to monitor the application of (a) those criteria and (b) that formula. [90978]

Mr. Vaz: The criteria used by the Legal Aid Board's Regional Legal Services Committees (RLSCs) to assess need for legal services in all categories of law are set out in their Strategic Plans, which were published in April 1999.

As a starting point for more detailed discussion, the North Western Legal Services Committee (NWLSC) carried out a preliminary assessment of need before taking into account local information. The following national data sets were used:

Census 1991 information on housing tenure and breakdown of ethnic minority populations;

DSS 1996 Income Support Claimants data; and the Department of Environment 1996 English House Condition Survey.

Although this information was used directly for the three categories, other information on unemployed claimants (NOMIS 1997) and County Court Debt Judgements (Equifax 1996) were also available to the Committee. In addition, indicators of general deprivation, the Index of Local Conditions (Robson Index) and the Underprivileged Areas Score (Jarman Index), were taken into account.

The draft strategy was widely consulted on through a series of focused meetings on specific subject areas, and conferences organised on a county basis. Written responses, which were also considered in finalising the strategies, were received from other organisations and agencies on the NWLSC network database, including Rochdale CAB, Rochdale Law Centre and Rochdale MBC Advice Services. Rochdale has been assessed as a high priority area for legal services in housing, immigration and employment matters, and subject-specific contracts will definitely be issued in these high priority areas.

The Legal Aid Board reported to the Lord Chancellor on all the RLSC strategic plans, which included an explanation of the criteria used to assess need. The Lord Chancellor considered the plans and approved them in April 1999. The Legal Services Commission will prepare an Annual Plan setting out how it intends to fund services to meet the needs identified by the RLSCs, and its Annual Report to the Lord Chancellor will report on how it has performed against its Plan. There is no formula used to assess the level of resources to meet identified need on a per capita basis, so there is nothing to monitor in that respect. However, officials are considering how best to monitor the performance of the Board and its successor, the Legal Services Commission, in identifying levels of need and addressing them through the granting of contracts.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how much money has been allocated to the not-for-profit agencies in (a) the North West Area and (b) the bidding area which includes Rochdale from the Legal Aid Board; what percentage has been allocated to date; and by what means additional moneys may be allocated during the financial year. [90977]

Mr. Vaz: The initial guide allocation of funds for contracts with not-for-profit organisations in the Legal Aid Board's North Western administrative area for 2000-01 is £1,508,000. However, legal aid areas are not constrained by their initial allocations, and the total amount allocated to not-for-profit organisations nationally may exceed the £20 million set aside for contracts with the not-for-profit sector. Funds for contracts with the not-for-profit sector are held at Legal Air Board area level and are not allocated to specific bid zones.

The deadline for applications for not-for-profit contracts was 1 June 1999. However, the Legal Aid Board will be unable to determine how much money will be allocated to not-for-profit contracts until applications have been received from solicitors in August 1999 and there has been the opportunity to consider the contracted provision across the whole region. Final contract decisions (and therefore the division of the overall controlled budget for civil advice and assistance between solicitors and the not-for-profit sector) will be made by October 1999, and will be subject to organisations meeting the relevant franchise and contract requirements. The Board is currently considering the development of a mechanism for allocating additional moneys, within the overall controlled budget, to not-for-profit organisations during the financial year.

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department under what circumstances sums additional to the £20 million which the Chair of the Legal Aid Board has allocated to the not-for-profit sector may be provided to the sector. [90976]

Mr. Vaz: Provided it remains within the overall allocation for civil advice and assistance, the Legal Aid Board may award contracts to those firms and organisations which are best able to deliver services to meet the priorities outlined in each area's Regional Legal Services Committee strategy. This includes not-for-profit sector organisations. A minimum of £20 million has been allocated for use in contracting with the not-for-profit sector. However, this sum could be exceeded if not-for-profit sector. However, this sum could be exceeded if not-for-profit organisations prove best able to meet identified priority needs, provided total expenditure remains within the total controlled budget for civil advice and assistance.

TREASURY

Savings Products

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many savings products have been issued with a CAT standard mark; [R] [89331]

(2) how many different types of ISA are currently being marketed by ISA providers. [R] [89705]

Ms Hewitt [holding answers 1 and 5 July 1999]: The Inland Revenue has approved a total of 395 ISA managers to provide one or more components of ISAs. 284 have been approved to offer the stock and shares component, 239 to offer the cash component and 68 to offer the life insurance component.

Individual ISA products, including products which meet the CAT standards, are not approved by the Inland Revenue or the Treasury and the information requested is not held centrally.

National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what current length of time is taken to process and issue juvenile national insurance numbers. [89875]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 July 1999]: Juveniles are registered for national insurance numbers by an automated process involving transfer of information from the Child Benefit computer to the National Insurance Recording System computer on magnetic tape. This is normally done at about the time a juvenile reaches the age of 15 years and 9 months and results in the automatic issue of a plastic national insurance number card.

The process to register juveniles for national insurance numbers is operating normally and there is no delay to customers. The process takes place over several days for each individual.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidance he has issued to (a) Benefits Agency staff handling juvenile Jobseeker's Allowance claims and (b) employers concerning the issuing of juvenile NI numbers. [89877]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 July 1999]: Information has been sent to Benefits Agency staff to make them aware that some school leavers will not have details of their national insurance numbers. Benefits Agency staff will have taken action to obtain the national insurance number for the young person. As a consequence, it has been possible for the Benefits Agency to process claims to Jobseeker's Allowance received from juveniles.

A national insurance number allows employers, who have young persons starting work, to send contribution information to the National Insurance Contributions Office for the correct record. A letter explaining the delay in issuing national insurance number plastic cards was sent to some employers in the week commencing 10 May 1999.

Employers requiring advice on how to obtain a national insurance number for an employee were asked in the letter to contact the existing employers Helpline. The Helpline provided details of how a written notification of the national insurance number could be obtained.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) adult registrations and (b) juvenile registrations for national insurance numbers are currently outstanding; and how long it will take to clear the outstanding juvenile registrations. [89876]

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many applications for a national insurance number have been delayed as a result of problems with NIRS2 computers. [91186]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 5 and 13 July 1999]: There is no delay in the processing of applications for adult registrations for national insurance numbers and there is no outstanding backlog.

The process to register and issue national insurance number cards for juveniles is now operating normally. However, a backlog of 300,000 juvenile registrations did accumulate in the period June 1998 to January 1999, when problems were experienced in implementing the appropriate NIRS2 software. This backlog was cleared by 30 June 1999, with the exception of 17,000 cases where further essential identity inquiries are being made. It is expected that this backlog will be cleared by 30 August 1999.

Self-administered Pension Schemes

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many small self-administered pension schemes there are in existence; how many such schemes have ceased to be approved within the last five years; what he estimates to be the loss to the Revenue when the scheme assets of schemes which have ceased to be approved are transferred offshore; what he estimates the gain to the Revenue will be from his proposals in the Budget to address that abuse; if he will list all the consultees to his proposals to address this abuse; and if he will make a statement. [90731]

Ms Hewitt: Tax-approved pension schemes enjoy very generous tax treatment to encourage the provision of pensions throughout retirement. Arrangements which abuse these tax reliefs are wholly unacceptable and we will take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that approved schemes are used only for a genuine pensions purpose.

There are 46,400 tax-approved small self-administered pension schemes (SSAPS) in existence and 447 have ceased to be tax approved within the last five years. SSAPS can lose approval for a wide variety of reasons not necessarily connected to tax avoidance.

Measures to clamp down on abuses of the pensions tax reliefs through arrangements involving the transfer of scheme assets offshore have been in place since 1994 and were further strengthened in the 1998 Budget. The measures are intended to deter this activity rather than to raise tax.

As the 1998 changes were to counter emerging tax avoidance schemes there was no advance consultation. The Inland Revenue are currently discussing with the Association of Pensioner Trustees arrangements for enhancing the role of independent trustees of SSAPS as part of the 1998 package of measures.

AA

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if windfall benefits to AA members arising from the sale of the AA will be taxed at the highest marginal rate of the taxpayer. [90929]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The Inland Revenue are considering with the AA how tax law will apply to any windfall benefits to AA members.

Gold Reserves

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement listing (a) when each element that constituted the gold reserves as at 30 June was acquired and (b) its value at the point of acquisition. [90783]

Ms Hewitt: The UK's official gold holdings were accumulated many years ago and it is not now possible to state when each element was acquired or at what price.

Budget Measures

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the impact on women compared to men of (a) the 1999 Budget measures and (b) the combined effect of the 1997, 1998 and 1999 Budget measures. [90818]

Ms Hewitt: Women make up a disproportionate number of the poorest groups in society. They are also more likely to be the primary care-giver to young children in families across the UK. The Government is committed to ensuring that women get a fair deal out of the tax and benefits system. To this end, the measures announced in the latest and previous Budgets boost the incomes of low-paid women and women who work part-time, as well as giving increased financial support to people caring for children.

Information on the average increase in weekly income, by gender, is given in the following table.

£ per week

	Women	Men	All individuals
Budget 1999	2.90	2.00	2.50
Budgets 1997, 1998 and 1999 combined	5.30	2.30	3.90

All the figures are relative to indexation and are in 1999–2000 prices. They reflect the impact on disposable income of the major direct tax, National Insurance, and benefit measures included in the 1999, 1998 and July 1997 Budgets and taking effect over the four years from 1998–99, plus the impact of the National Minimum Wage. They are based on data from the ONS Family Expenditure Survey.

Insurance Companies (Regulation)

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, prior to the regulation of insurance companies being taken over by the Financial Services Authority, he will review the capital adequacy of insurance companies; and if he will make a statement. [90035]

Ms Hewitt: I have no plans to do so.

VAT (Small Companies)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the procedure for small companies registered for VAT in the United Kingdom to claim back VAT paid in Italy. [91430]

Dawn Primarolo: To claim back VAT paid in Italy, a UK business must make a claim on a special form, obtainable from the Italian authorities, within six months of the end of the calendar year in which the VAT was incurred. Original invoices or receipts which prove that Italian VAT was paid must accompany the claim, together with a Form VAT 66 certificate from Customs and Excise showing that the business is VAT registered in the UK.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fisheries Council

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reason the United Kingdom abstained on quotas reached at the Fisheries Council of 10 June. [90949]

Mr. Morley: The Council adopted a proposal introducing in 1999 two new Total Allowable Catches (TACs) and national quota allocations for North Sea spurdog and Northern prawn; and allocating in 1999 two existing TACs for blue whiting in Western waters and the Bay of Biscay. While the UK's shares of the spurdog and Northern prawn TACs were acceptable, one final share of the Western blue whiting TAC, although a significant improvement on the Commission's proposal, did not adequately reflect the substantial UK interest in this fishery. That being so, I decided that a UK abstention was appropriate.

EC Surplus Food Scheme

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reason the UK Government have elected not to operate the EU Surplus Food Scheme in the United Kingdom. [90701]

Mr. Rooker: Uptake for the scheme was disappointing and we were unable to utilise fully the quantities of beef set aside by the Commission for the UK. The Government therefore considered that the scheme did not provide good value for money, nor achieve its primary objective of making a serious contribution to the disposal of UK stocks of intervention beef.

Departmental Buildings

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (a) location, (b) purpose, (c) number of staff accommodated and their wage costs and (d) running costs of the buildings owned, rented and occupied by his Department or its agencies in Scotland. [90860]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 14 July 1999]: The Department directly employs veterinary and technical staff of the State Veterinary Service (SVS) which are stationed in Scotland at the following locations:

Pentland House, Edinburgh
Greyfield House, Edinburgh
Inverness
Thurso
Inverurie
Kirkwall
Elgin
Perth
Forfar
Oban
Ayr
Dumfries
Stranraer
Galashiels
Hamilton.

The SVS operates throughout Great Britain and implements the animal health, animal welfare and public protection policies of the Department, the Scottish Executive Rural Affairs Department (SERAD) and the National Assembly for Wales. The estimated salary cost of the 78.5 veterinary and technical staff stationed in Scotland is £3.06 million. All accommodation costs for these staff and their administrative support costs are met by SERAD.

The Meat Hygiene Service (MHS), operates a Regional Office from Saughton House in Edinburgh. This Office co-ordinates the daily operations of meat inspectors and Official Veterinary Surgeons who work within licensed fresh meat premises throughout the MHS Scotland Region. Nine staff work directly from the Office, whose wage costs for this financial year are estimated at £182,000. The building is not owned by the MHS but it will pay an estimated £10,000 towards it s running costs this financial year.

The Department and its agencies also occupies three other sites in Scotland. The first is the Veterinary Laboratories Agency Lasswade, where a building is rented on the Pentland Science Park on the outskirts of Edinburgh. It carries out research and diagnostic services of farmed livestock and wildlife. There are 32 staff on the site and wage costs for this financial year are estimated at £655,000. The annual rent is £73,000. For this financial year fuel and utilities are estimated at £11,000, facilities management will be £35,000 and other running costs such as training, consumables and travel are budgeted at £157,000. The contribution in lieu of rates has still to be assessed.

The Department owns a redundant laboratory and an adjacent storage building at Torry in Aberdeen. These are in the process of being sold for redevelopment. No staff are employed on the site. This year the Department will pay a capital charge of £60,000 for the property, a contribution in lieu of rates of £64,000 and maintenance and security costs of £10,000.

The Department also owns two redundant stores near Perth, known as Almondbank 4 and 5. These are in the process of being sold. No staff are employed on the site. Over the next year we have budgeted to pay £54,000 in capital charges and £5,000 for maintenance and security. A contribution in lieu of rates is not payable on empty storage buildings.

Flood and Coastal Defences

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has undertaken an environmental appraisal of the Flood and Coastal Defence Project Appraisal Guidance Note 3: Economic Appraisal; and if he will make a statement. [91140]

Mr. Morley: An environmental appraisal of the Flood and Coastal Defence Project Appraisal Guidance: Economic Appraisal is not appropriate. The guide, which is one of a planned series on the appraisal of flood and coastal defence projects, will set out the economic principles that should be followed in undertaking project appraisal. Specifically, it will indicate how the requirements set out in the Treasury's "Green Book" can be achieved and outline good practice. It will be an update of the 1993 Project Appraisal Guidance Note with clarification of areas where there has been uncertainty in its use by operating authorities. It will support current policy and assist operation of the grant aid system. Another document in the series will provide guidance on environmental appraisal.

EU Food and Veterinary Office

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspections of UK food premises were made by officials of the European Union Food and Veterinary Office in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; and what was the purpose of those inspections. [88288]

Mr. Rooker: During 1997–98, five missions to the UK were carried out by the European Union Food and Veterinary Office (FVO) involving inspections of food premises. In 1998–99, seven such missions were undertaken. All were to assess compliance by the UK with the requirements of Community legislation in the food and veterinary area, as part of the FVO's ongoing programme of visits to all member states.

Mouse Breeding Facilities

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) of 29 June 1999, Official Report, column 150, on mouse-breeding facilities, how many mice were bred in the last year for which figures are available; and how many of those were subsequently destroyed without being used for the purpose for which they were bred. [90514]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 12 July 1999]: In 1998, a total of 16,180 mice were bred by my Department. Of these, 16 per cent. were surplus to requirement and subsequently culled.

HEALTH

Nurse Recruitment

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses (a) have been recruited to the NHS since the launch of his recruitment campaign on 1 February and (b) were recruited to the NHS during the periods (i) 1 February 1998 to 30 March 1998 and (ii) 1 February 1997 to 30 March 1997. [80286]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 13 April 1999]: Since the recruitment campaign began on 1 February 1999, 1,233 nurses have returned to employment in the National Health Service.

Information about the number of nurses joining the National Health Service is available from the annual survey conducted by the Office of Manpower Economics on behalf of the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine. The results from the March 1998 survey are in the Sixteenth Review Body Report, which is available in the Library.

Medium Secure Units

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions patients have absconded from medium secure units in the last three years, and from which units; and on how many of those occasions (a) it was assessed that there was a risk to the public and (b) members of the public were assaulted or threatened. [87044]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 15 June 1999]: The Department does not collect data centrally on the number of patients who either escape from National Health Service trust medium secure units or abscond while on leave.

Information on escapes and absconding is routinely collected by each health authority as part of its contract monitoring. Only the most serious incidents are reported to the NHS regional office and would not, for example, include those where a patient goes missing for a minute or two on escorted leave or where a patient returned late by a few minutes from home leave.

The present arrangements require the most serious incidents to be reported by health authorities to regional offices.

The Department is currently reviewing the collection of data relating to escapes and absconds from medium secure units.

Cancer Information Strategy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will assess the benefits of the Macmillan Cancer Relief campaign, "A Voice for Life", prior to formulating the Government's Cancer Information Strategy. [89086]

Mr. Hutton: We welcome the new Macmillan campaign, "A Voice for Life". We are pleased to be assisting Macmillan in the campaign by arranging for copies of the booklet, "The Cancer Guide", to be distributed to cancer units and cancer centres so that it can be made available to all those diagnosed with cancer.

We are working closely with the voluntary sector, including Macmillan Cancer Relief, to develop the Cancer Information Strategy.

NHS Site Sales

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the sites owned by the National Health Service which have been sold for housing development in the past five years and for each site the company to which it was sold, and the current status of the development. [90741]

Mr. Denham: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Domestic Violence

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department has taken to (a) inform patients who are victims of domestic violence of support services available and (b) provide guidelines to health employees, on dealing with patients who may be victims of domestic violence. [90746]

Mr. Hutton: As part of the Government's Break the Chain domestic violence awareness campaign launched earlier this year, the Department distributed leaflets and posters, giving advice to victims of domestic violence, to all general practitioners practices and directors of social services. Copies of the leaflet and poster are shortly to be sent to all NHS trust nurse directors in England to be placed in hospital patient information racks.

Additionally, a training and resource pack Making an Impact commissioned by the Department was launched in June of last year. Focusing particularly on children and domestic violence in families, the pack aims to equip frontline staff with the skills to identify victims of abuse and to provide support.

The Department has also commissioned work to synthesise existing guidelines for health professionals to help them recognise and deal with victims of domestic abuse. These guidelines will be ready later this year.

Bullying

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued to health authorities on the provision of specialist trauma reduction and support counselling for children suffering post-traumatic stress as a result of bullying at school; and if he will make a statement. [90759]

Mr. Hutton: None. Health authorities are responsible for the availability of services for children and adolescents suffering from a range of mental health problems, including provision of specialist services where appropriate.

The Government is making an additional £90 million available over the next three years to improve child and adolescent mental health services.

Prescription Medicines

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 393, on prescription medicines, if he will list the profits made by each pharmaceutical company under the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [90770]

Mr. Denham: Under the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme, pharmaceutical companies provide a range of financial information to the Department to enable the effective management and operation of the scheme. This information is provided in confidence.

Linear Accelerators

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each health authority the number and cost of linear accelerators installed in NHS trusts for each year from 1992; and if he will make a statement. [90762]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the number of linear accelerators in cancer centres is not available centrally but will be contained in the review of radiotherapy provision which will be sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State shortly for consideration.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the Annual report and Accounts of the Medicines Control Agency. [91905]

Ms Jowell: We have received the report and copies have today been laid before both Houses of Parliament in accordance with the requirements of Section 5(2) and 5(3) of the Exchequer and Audit Departments Act 1921. Copies have also been placed in the Library.

Medicines Commission

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to receive the Annual report of the Medicines Commission for 1998; and if this will be published. [91906]

Ms Jowell: We have received the report, and copies have been laid before both Houses of Parliament today in accordance with the requirements of section 5(2) of the Medicines Act 1968.

Bound and published volumes have been placed in the Library containing the 1998 reports of the Medicines Commission, the Committee on Safety of Medicines, the Advisory Board on the Registration of Homeopathic Products, the British Pharmacopoeia Commission and the Veterinary Products Committee.

We are pleased to acknowledge the valuable work undertaken by the distinguished members of the Medicines Act Advisory Boards and thank them for the time and considerable effort dedicated in the public interest to this important work.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to include asthma as an illness which qualifies the sufferer for free prescriptions; and if he will make a statement. [91428]

Mr. Denham: We reviewed exemptions from prescription charges in the Comprehensive Spending Review and concluded that the present arrangements should remain for the rest of this Parliament.

Spinal Cord Injury

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans Her Majesty's Government have to make spinal cord injury a notifiable condition. [91425]

Mr. Hutton: There are no plans to make spinal cord injury a notifiable condition. Notifiable conditions are all communicable diseases which pose a threat to public health.

Medicinal Products (Classification)

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the outcome of the Government's consideration of the public response to the MCA's proposals for classifying borderline products as published in its consultation letter MLX 249. [91861]

Ms Jowell: We have carefully considered all the areas of concern raised by respondents in what has been a very active consultation process. We will be announcing tomorrow our detailed response on specific issues and we will be responding positively to all the main concerns raised. There has never been any intention to, and there is no effect in these proposals that would, change the definition of a medicinal product. The Government's intention is to ensure that the legal obligation to protect public health is safeguarded while maintaining public access to a range of safe dietary supplements and natural products.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prisoner Releases

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the total number of people (a) killed and (b) injured as a result of crimes committed by prisoners who were subsequently successful in their application for an accelerated release date. [91439]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: This information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners who successfully applied to the Prison Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date have reoffended since their release; and what was the nature of their new offences. [91437]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: Three of the 280 prisoners who successfully applied for accelerated release to the independent Sentences Review Commission, and who have now been released from prison, have since reoffended. The nature of the charges against two of the three includes assault against police officers and breach of the peace; Grievous Bodily Harm with intent; Assault Occasioning Actual Bodily Harm; and Affray. The third person was convicted of receiving stolen goods and of deception. None of the three has broken the terms of their licence conditions.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list, for each prisoner who successfully applied to the Prison Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date, the nature of their offence, the term of imprisonment to which they were sentenced, and the term of imprisonment that they served prior to their release. [91451]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: The information requested is not readily available in the format in which it has been requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

However of the 424 successful applications that have been made to the Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date, (282 determinate sentence prisoners and 142 indeterminate sentence prisoners), a total of 280 prisoners (190 determinate sentence prisoners and 90 determinate sentence prisoners) have been released.

As per section 4(1) of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998, of the 190 determinate sentence prisoners who have been released all have served at least one third of their sentence, and in some cases in excess of one third had been served before they were released. Again, as per section 6(1) of the 1998 Act, of the 90 indeterminate sentence prisoners who have been released, all have served at least two thirds of the period they could otherwise have been expected to serve, and in some cases in excess of two thirds had been served before they were released.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners have to date applied to the Prison Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date; in how many cases the Commission made a determination; and, for unsuccessful applications, what reasons were given. [91440]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: A total of 518 prisoners have to date applied to the Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date. The Commissioners have issued determinations in 440 cases. Of those applications that have been unsuccessful, the reasons given are that the Commissioners are not satisfied that the offences were committed in connection with terrorism and the affairs of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proportion of prisoners who successfully applied to the Prison Sentences Review Commission for an accelerated release date were released having served less than (a) a quarter and (b) one half of their sentence. [91438]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: A total of 280 prisoners have to date been released in accordance with the terms of the Good Friday Agreement, of which 190 were serving fixed term sentences. No fixed term prisoners who successfully applied to the Sentences Review Commission were released early having served less than a quarter of their sentence. All 190 fixed term prisoners released early would have served less than one half of their sentence at the time of accelerated release.

A total of 90 indeterminate sentence prisoners have also been released under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

Victims' Remains

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what (a) policing costs and (b) other costs have been incurred through action taken to locate victims' remains under the Northern Ireland (Location of Victims' Remains) Act 1999; what progress has been made; and if she will make a statement. [91453]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 15 July 1999]: Following implementation of the Northern Ireland (Location of Victims' Remains) Act 1999, the cost to the UK for the operation of the independent Commission amounts to £694.50 to date. Of this, £610.50 has been spent on transport and associated expenses for the UK Commissioner, Sir Kenneth Bloomfield. The other £84 has been spent on setting up a Post Office Box. There have been no policing costs to the United Kingdom arising from the operation of the Act.

The remains of one individual, believed to be Eamon Molloy, were recovered in Dundalk on the first day of the Commission's operation, Friday 28 May. On June 29, human remains were found by Gardai at Colgagh in County Monaghan. This was the site which had been indicated as the location of the remains of Brian McKinney and John McClory. The State Pathologist was called to the scene and the Commission later confirmed that the remains of two individuals had been located. Work is ongoing to confirm the identities of the two individuals.

In light of this encouraging development, I understand that the Commission has asked the Garda Siochana to reassess the plans for the continuation of excavations at any site where available information indicates a prospect of making further discoveries and to report the conclusions to the Commission. The Commission has undertaken to communicate further information as events evolve.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Asbestos Directive

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ensure the speedy passage of the Asbestos Directive through the European Commission. [89343]

Mr. Meacher: The Government are determined to apply further, necessary restrictions to the importation, marketing and use of white asbestos. I am hopeful that the European Commission will ratify, without undue delay, the vote of their technical committee to adapt to technical progress Council Directive 76/769/EEC. The UK continues to encourage the Commission to act swiftly on this vitally important measure. I have received advice from the Health and Safety Commission about domestic implementation of the Directive (when ratified) in the form of draft regulations. I will act on that advice as soon as the European Commission has ratified the vote of its technical committee.

M1 Link Road

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in relation to the link road to Scratchwood Services M1, from Ellesmere Avenue NW7 (a) what vehicles are authorised to use the road, (b) who authorises use, (c) who polices unauthorised use, (d) for what purpose the link road was built, (e) whether rat running to gain access to the M1 by the link road is authorised use, (f) what consideration has been given to closing the link road and (g) what consideration has been given to measures to prevent rat running; and if he will make a statement. [89716]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Andrew Dismore, dated 16 July 1999:

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, Glenda Jackson, has asked me to reply to your recent question about the link road to the Scratchwood Services on the M1 Motorway.

The link road was built to provide vehicular access to Scratchwood. Those authorised to use the road under a legal agreement between the Secretary of State and Welcome Break, who operate the services, are service area employees, delivery vans, maintenance depot employees and the emergency services. Guests at the Welcome Break Lodge are also allowed to use the access. Rat running to gain access to the M1 motorway is not an authorised use and Welcome Break are legally required to police the road by providing and maintaining a suitable barrier or gate across the link road to prevent such use. This means Welcome Break must keep the barrier shut except to admit authorised users.

It would not be possible to close the link road permanently as Welcome Break are required to maintain access at all times to authorised users. The Highways Agency is working with Welcome Break to provide a more efficient means of preventing unauthorised use of the link road.

Road Traffic

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) by what percentage he estimates road traffic will increase in the London area over the next 30 years; and what assessment he has made of the impact of this on the speed of traffic; [90648]

(2) by what percentage his Department estimates that road traffic levels will increase over the next 30 years; what assessment it has made of the impact that will have on current rates of traffic movement; and if he will make a statement; [90649]

(3) if he will estimate (a) the cost of building roads to accommodate the projected increase in road vehicles over the next 30 years to maintain current rates of traffic movement and (b) the number of miles of road this would require. [90650]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The National Road Traffic Forecasts published in 1997 predicted that on the basis of the capacity of the road network as it then stood, and in the absence of the new policies set out in the Integrated Transport White Paper, road traffic in Great Britain could increase by nearly 50 per cent. over the next 30 years. This growth was forecast to result in a reduction in average speeds of 10 per cent., although the reduction during the peak on the busiest roads would be substantially greater. The Department is currently working on a new set of traffic forecasts which will reflect the potential of the New Deal for Transport to tackle congestion and pollution.

The 1997 National Road Traffic Forecasts were not designed to provide forecasts at a local level. However, it is possible to use the 1997 forecasts to produce crude estimates of what they imply for traffic growth and speeds in different area types and regions. These estimates suggest that the national figures quoted would imply traffic growth in London of about 30 per cent. over the next 30 years and a decline in average speeds of 14 per cent.

No estimate has been made of the additional road capacity that would be required to accommodate the rates of traffic growth in the 1997 forecasts at unchanged speeds, nor has the Department attempted to quantify the enormous environmental, economic, and social costs that would be involved. Adding road capacity in congested conditions generates additional traffic, thereby adding to the road traffic growth to be accommodated. This link highlights one of the fundamental flaws in the predict and provide philosophy and is a key reason why simply building more roads is not the answer to traffic growth.

Traffic Calming

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the average cost of traffic calming schemes approved in the last financial year for which figures are available. [90855]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: This information is not held centrally. Local highway authorities are responsible for the decision to introduce a traffic calming scheme, and do not need the Secretary of State's approval unless, exceptionally, they wish to use a traffic calming feature which is not covered by regulations under the Traffic Calming Act 1992.

Stansted Airport

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many meetings the Minister for Transport in London had with officials and others regarding the draft Stansted Airport Aircraft Movement Limit (Amendment) Order 1999. [91049]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 14 July 1999]: By convention, Government do not comment on internal discussions between Ministers and officials.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) met a delegation of local MPs led by the right hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Sir A. Haselhurst) on 14 April.

Buses

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how he intends to improve the enforcement of bus priority schemes. [91496]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Bus priority measures are important for helping to make bus services quicker and more reliable. Their implementation is the responsibility of the local highway authority which should liaise with the local police on their enforcement.

Trials of enforcement cameras for bus lanes have been carried out successfully in London. This involves prosecuting offenders using camera evidence. Cameras will be installed across London over the next few years. Further trials using existing CCTV cameras are also being undertaken.

Outside London we are encouraging local authorities to take up decriminalised parking enforcement powers. This would enable them to target parking offences that affect the operation of bus priority schemes.

We hope to see a wider use of these approaches to improve enforcement.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions his Department is holding with bus and coach manufacturers on developing vehicles to cater for the needs of elderly and disabled people. [91774]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Bus and coach manufacturers have been closely involved in discussions with my Department over the past two years on the development of standards for accessibility that will form the basis of the regulations we will be bringing forward under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

In addition to a large number of one to one meetings with manufacturers, there has been an extensive round of informal consultation on the proposals. There will shortly be a further round of consultation on the final proposals and the draft regulations which will come into effect from next year.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many bus journeys were made on local stage bus journeys in English shire counties in the year 1998–99; and if he will make a statement. [91728]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Estimates of bus passenger journeys in 1998–99 will be published later this year. The latest available estimate shows that 1.25 billion passenger journeys were made on local, or stage, bus services in English shire counties in 1997–98. Our bus policy proposals, together with additional funding for rural transport, are aimed at better bus provision and increased bus use.

Greater London Authority

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much the Greater London Authority will pay to his Department for leasing Romney House until the London Bridge City building is ready for occupation. [91511]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 15 July 1999]: It is anticipated that staff from the GLA and some associated bodies will occupy around 60 per cent. of the available space in Romney House from next year. This is expected to cost around £2 million per annum to provide and will be taken into account when the budget for the GLA is set later this year.

Housing

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of Single Regeneration Budget funds for schemes currently in operation has been spent on capital projects for (a) housing improvement and (b) new dwellings. [91701]

Mr. Meale: The Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) currently funds over 500 (Rounds 1–4) regeneration schemes managed by local partnerships. A large number of these are likely to have multiple objectives, and cover a wide range of activities depending on local regeneration needs and priorities. It is not possible to break down expenditure to say how much has benefited one objective, therefore no information is available on the amount spent on capital projects for housing improvement or new dwellings.

Green Ministers Committee

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Green Ministers Committee last met; and what was discussed. [92119]

Mr. Meacher: The Green Ministers Committee met on 6 July. The main item on the agenda was finalising our plans for publishing our first annual report later this month. Publication of the report will be another important step in the greening Government process, making our work more open and transparent. It will set out our future programme of work as well as what we have achieved so far.

The Committee also discussed the recent report from the Environmental Audit Committee on the greening Government initiative, how Departments can raise awareness of sustainable development and the role that Departments have in promoting biodiversity. Each Department will prepare a strategy statement on raising awareness of sustainable development and action plans on biodiversity.

Seven of the 15 English Departments were represented by Ministers (and a further five by officials) and Lord Dubs attended for the Northern Ireland Office.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Counsel (Remuneration)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to ensure that leading counsel are remunerated on the basis of the work they have carried out on a case and its complexity. [91582]

Mr. Vaz: The Rules of Court provide sufficient powers to ensure that lawyers are paid for the weight and complexity of the work they have undertaken and not simply because of their status. The new Civil Procedure Rules specifically require the Court awarding costs to have regard to what is proportionate to the issues at stake and the complexity of the particular case. This is in addition to the existing tests that it must have been reasonable to incur the expense at all and that the sum being claimed is itself reasonable in amount. If these tests are applied robustly, they ought to be sufficient. However, if there is any evidence that these tests are insufficient, I am happy to consider what more may be needed.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the rules of court governing the levels of fees charged by leading counsel. [91583]

Mr. Vaz: The Civil Procedure Rules do not govern the levels of fees charged by leading counsel, other than in the specific case of fast track trial costs. However, the new Rules do require the court, when deciding the amount of costs, to have regard to what is proportionate for the particular case. This is in addition to the existing tests that it must have been reasonable to incur the expense at all and that the sum being claimed is itself reasonable in amount. Where the court believes costs incurred are not proportionate, it has the discretion to amend the costs allowed accordingly.

In criminal matters, graduated fees apply in the vast majority of cases of up to 10 days' duration. In the remaining cases, the level of fees allowed is currently at the discretion of the Crown Court Determining Officer, based on the weight and complexity of the case. For the future we are considering what steps we shall take by way of contracting, or other means, to achieve better control over the costs of all criminal cases.

Counsel (Instruction)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to ensure that the instruction of two counsel in the same case by litigants is permitted only in cases of sufficient complexity to merit two counsel. [91585]

Mr. Vaz: All litigants have the right to choose their own counsel in civil cases, including the number of counsel. The Civil Procedure Rules, while retaining this principle, set out an overriding objective of proportionality. If a party uses counsel in a way which is disproportionate to the nature, complexity or value of the claim, or to the financial position of the other party, the court could, for example, refuse to award the payment of the excessive costs.

Equality of Arms

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to ensure equality of arms in the instruction of counsel by litigants. [91584]

Mr. Vaz: The Government believe that litigants should be free to choose their advocate—whether barrister, solicitor or other authorised advocate. The professional bodies ensure that all advocates have attained a specified standard of advocacy sufficient to enable them to present their client's case effectively.

Court Dress

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will conduct a consultation on the rules relating to court dress. [91651]

Mr. Vaz: The Lord Chancellor is aware of the opinions of my hon. Friend and others about the rules relating to court dress. The Lord Chancellor is considering how best to take this issue forward.

HOME DEPARTMENT

British Citizenship (Applications)

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications were made for British Citizenship by non-British nationals under the age of 18 years in (a) 1995, (b) 1996, (c) 1997 and (d) 1998; and how many such applications have been (i) granted and (ii) refused in each of these years. [91289]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information is not available in the form requested.

Applications are not always completed in the year of receipt. The table shows the number of grants and refusals for the years in question.

Year	Grants	Refusals
1995	8,765	1,285
1996	9,106	1,383
1997	9,364	1,240
1998	11,857	1,169

The refusal figures include many children who were formally recorded as Refused because they were British Citizens already.

Matthews v. UK

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effects of the decision by the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Matthews v. the United Kingdom on (a) Jersey, (b) Guernsey, (c) the Isle of Man and (d) Gibraltar. [91250]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The judgment in the Matthews case applies to Gibraltar and the Government have already announced their intention to seek to give effect to it by extending the franchise in European parliamentary elections to Gibraltar.

The judgment does not affect the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man since they are not, except for a few limited purposes, part of the European Union.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90532]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Since June 1997, my Department has commissioned the following internal staff surveys or monitoring information:

(i) A survey of central Home Office staff was carried out in early 1997. This included details by gender, race and age and also included a question on disability. The results of the survey were published in the September 1998 issue of "Personnel News", the Home Office staff magazine. A second staff survey is planned for September 1999.

(ii) For each recruitment campaign, applicants' information is collected on gender, ethnicity and disability to augment the data already held. This included recent recruitment campaigns for Administrative Assistants, Assistant Immigration Officers and Immigration and Prison Officers. Similar information was collected for recent promotion boards.

(iii) A staff disability survey, to update and collect new information, is currently being prepared.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Compensation

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 12 July 1999, Official Report, column 61, on compensation payments, if he will provide similar information on compensation payments for each of the last five years; and if he will list for each of the categories of compensation the total amount paid in each of those years and in 1998–99. [91650]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. Detailed central records are kept of the date that payments are authorised, as opposed to when payment was made. This information is summarised in the tables.

Pensions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the combined value of a full basic state pension and the maximum possible second state pension as a proportion of the value of the minimum income guarantee in (a) 2040, (b) 2050 and (c) 2060 based on current assumptions about the indexation of each of these benefits. [91137]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

The combined value of a full basic state pension and the maximum possible state second pension (i.e. a person who has earned at or above the upper earnings limit throughout their working life), as a proportion of the minimum income guarantee (MIG) for a person retiring in the years indicated

Year of retirement	State retirement pension as a percentage of the MIG
2040	132
2050	117
2060	110

Notes:
1. The individual concerned is assumed to work for 49 years from age 16 and retire at age 65 in the years indicated, earning at or above the Upper Earnings Limit for National Insurance contributions throughout their working life.
2. Earnings are assumed to grow 1.5 per cent. faster than prices.
3. It is assumed that State Second Pension is introduced in 2002.
4. It is assumed that the individual concerned remains contracted-in to the State Second Pension when the second stage is introduced (assumed to be in 2006) although, on the assumptions stated, it would be in the individual's interests to contract out.

Pensioners

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners claiming income support in the Coventry, South parliamentary constituency will benefit from (a) winter fuel payments and (b) the guaranteed minimum pensioner income. [89456]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Income Support and Winter Fuel Payments is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 15 July 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent parliamentary question asking how may pensioners in receipt of Income Support (IS) in the Coventry South constituency will benefit from (a) a winter fuel payment and (b) the guaranteed minimum pensioner income.

As at February 1999, the latest date for which administration data is available, it is estimated that there were approximately 2,800 pensioners in receipt of IS in Coventry South parliamentary constituency. "Pensioner" in this context means either a single person aged over 60 or a couple where one or both partners are over 60. We would expect a similar number to be receiving the minimum income guarantee for pensioners from April, and these pensioners will also benefit from the £100 winter fuel payment this winter.

The minimum income guarantee for pensioners, delivered through IS, was introduced in April to provide a single pensioner with a weekly income of a least £75 a week, and a couple £116.60 a week. The threefold increase in the normal price uprating of the IS rates for pensioners will mean that this year, a single pensioners could be £160 a year better off in real terms. In addition to those pensioners already in receipt of IS in April, nationally it is estimated that a further 65,000 will become entitled due to the increase in benefit rates.

It is also estimated that within your constituency there are a further 13,790 pensioners who will also receive a Winter Fuel Payment next winter on the grounds that they are in receipt of a different qualifying benefit, for example Retirement Pension. Some of these pensioners may have a possible entitlement to minimum pensioner income.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

[90564]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The MOD employed 23,220 civilian and military staff in Scotland as at 1 April 1998, of which 8,527 staff were employed by executive agencies at that date. These staffs were employed in the following numbers at the locations listed:

Married Quarters

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the number of married quarters, (b) the number empty and (c) the vacancy rate as a percentage in each year since 1992. [90629]

Mr. Spellar [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1999, c. 226–27]: I regret to inform the hon. Gentleman that there was an error in the information given. The inception date for the Defence Housing Executive should read 1995 not 1985.

Low Flying Aircraft

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were conducted by service low flying aircraft (a) over Wales and (b) over mainland Britain in each of the years 1990 to the present. [91476]

Mr. Spellar: The information is not held in the precise form requested. Military low flying activity is recorded by Low Flying Areas (LFA) and number of movements. LFA 7 covers all of Wales apart from a small area in the north-east of Powys. The annual number of day movements within LFA 7 since 1990 is shown in the table, along with the number of movements booked in the UK Low Flying System as a whole.

[1] A movement is recorded each time an aircraft crosses an LFA boundary and a low flying sortie will often be made up of a number of movements

[2] The UK Low Flying System covers the whole of the country, including both mainland Britain and the various islands

Environmental Programmes

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of neon light tubing is currently recycled by his Department. [88443]

Mr. Spellar: My Department does not have any significant uses of neon light tubing, but the MOD Disposal Sales Agency (DSA) has set up a recycling scheme across government Departments for fluorescent light tubing in conjunction with the waste companies Biffa Ltd. and Mercury Recycling Ltd. DSA take every opportunity to encourage tube recycling and are planning to widen the scheme to include different designs of tubing. Within MOD, existing disposal contracts are considered for the recycling scheme as and when they come up for renewal.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what shipyards in the United Kingdom have the capacity to construct the proposed new aircraft carriers. [90938]

Mr. Spellar: The size of the new aircraft carriers is currently estimated to be up to 40,000 tonnes. On this basis the UK shipyards with sufficient capacity to construct the vessels are: Harland and Wolff; Kvaerner Govan: Marconi Marine (VSEL) Ltd, Cammell Laird and Swan Hunter. Depending on the design selected there may be a need for these facilities to be enhanced.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Power Stations

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on Baglan Cogeneration Ltd.'s application to build a new combined cycle gas turbine power station at Baglan Bay, South Wales. [92027]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to Baglan Cogeneration for the construction of a 500 MW combined cycle gas turbine power station at the BP Chemicals site at Baglan Bay, Port Talbot in South Wales. I have also deemed planning permission to be granted subject to 44 planning conditions agreed with the Neath Port Talbot County Borough Council. The reasons why there were no energy policy objections to the proposal were given in the decision letter of 7 April 1999.

Copies of the Press Notice and the Section 36 decision letter are being placed in the Library.

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to make his decision on Eastern Generation Ltd.'s application for the Drakelow C coal-fired power station to be dual-fired by gas. [92026]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to Eastern Generation Ltd. for the conversion of Drakelow C coal-fired power station to allow it to be dual fired by gas.

I have taken into account the arguments for and against the conversion. I concluded that as long as strict conditions were attached to the consent, then the benefits of the conversion, such as extending the life of the power station and thereby protecting jobs, outweighed the disadvantages. I also consider planning permission to be granted, subject to five planning conditions agreed with South Derbyshire District Council.

This decision has been taken in line with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government Response to Fourth and Fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071).

Copies of the Press Notice and decision letter are being placed in the Library.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry following his announcement of a stricter power station consents policy for a limited period while other reforms of the electricity market are put in place, what criteria must be met before he will relax the policy; and when he will carry this out. [91573]

Mr. Battle: It is the expectation that the stricter power station consents policy will be relaxed as soon as the Government conclude that their programme of reform of the electricity market is substantially complete and the distortions identified in the White Paper (cm 4071) have been removed.

Single Currency

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much expenditure his Department (a) has incurred to date and (b) expects to incur in the future on preparations for possible United Kingdom entry into the European single currency; and if he will make a statement. [91421]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 15 July 1999]: Following the publication of the Government's Outline National Changeover Plan, my Department is considering what preparations may be necessary.

MOX Fuel

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library the unclassified material produced by the Safeguards Department on the subject of MOX fuel. [91077]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon), to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 7 July 1999, Official Report, column 578.

Sports Shoe Manufacturers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions have been held by his Department with the manufacturers of sports shoes on the employment practices of their suppliers in non-European countries. [90348]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: The Government have made clear in the House and elsewhere that we are firmly opposed to the use of abusive labour practices around the world, particularly those which exploit child labour. We have strongly supported initiatives in the International Labour Organisation aimed at improving countries' compliance with internationally recognised labour standards. We have also supported initiatives such as the Ethical Trading Initiative to encourage importers to develop effective and verifiable codes of conduct with their overseas suppliers.

EU Structural Funds

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what principles will determine the allocation of EU Structural Funds to each of the UK's Objective 1 areas. [91455]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 15 July 1999]: On 1 July the Commission announced financial allocations of European Structural Funds for all member states.

The Commission used a methodology to calculate each member state's financial allocation for Objective 1 which was based on eligible population, regional and national prosperity, and the relative severity of the structural problems, especially the level of unemployment. The allocations for each UK Objective 1 area have been calculated on the same basis.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what allocation the United Kingdom has received of European Structural Funds; and what percentage take-up he estimates there will be for each year in the programme. [91454]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 15 July 1999]: From 2000 to 2006, the total allocation for the UK from EU Structural Funds will be over £10 billion (over fifteen and a half billion euros).

I see no reason why there should not be 100 per cent. take-up.

Trade Mission (Turkey)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which companies will be represented on his Department's outward mission to Turkey between 28 September and 2 October organised in conjunction with the Defence Manufacturers' Association. [91176]

Mr. Wilson: A number of companies have requested further information about the exhibition. A number of applications are expected before the cut-off date at the end of July.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish a Code of Practice, under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, explaining the duties of trade organisations. [92081]

Ms Hodge: A Code of Practice is being published for trade organisations today. These are organisations of workers or of employers, or any other organisation whose members carry on a particular profession or trade. They include bodies such as trade unions, employers' associations and chartered professional institutions.

The Code provides guidance to trade organisations about new responsibilities that they will have under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 from 1 October this year towards their disabled members or applicants for membership. From this date, they may have to make reasonable adjustments to prevent any arrangements they make placing a disabled member or applicant at a substantial disadvantage in comparison to those who are not disabled.

Class Sizes

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the average class sizes were for five to seven-year-olds within the city of Sunderland in (a) May 1999 and (b) May 1997. [90278]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information is shown in the following table.

Mr. Mudie: The information is given in the table.

Full-time home domiciled students aged 18–21 in England

	Academic year
	1997–98	1998–99
Students in full-time education[1]
Numbers	707,662	730,539
As percentage of age group	31.1	31.1

[1] In higher education, further education and schools.

Overseas Students

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the joint working groups between the Department for International Development, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and his Department on matters relating to (a) overseas students in the United Kingdom and (b) the provision by the United Kingdom of educational services abroad. [90975]

Mr. Mudie: The Departments for Education and Employment, for International Development and for Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office work together formally and informally on a wide range of issues relating to overseas students in the UK, and UK education abroad. They are joined by the Home Office and other partners, including the British Council and British Trade International on an inter-departmental working group on the strategy to attract more overseas students to the UK. In addition, the Education and Training Export Group is an advisory group of business people and experts which reports to the Departments of Education and Employment and Trade and Industry on the promotion of UK education and training abroad.

Sixth Form Colleges

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reasons there is no separate section for sixth form colleges on his Department's website; and if he will make a statement. [90868]

Mr. Mudie: The Department's website is navigated through a search engine, which allows searches via a key word. Information on a wide range of topics, including sixth form colleges, can be accessed in this way. The site also contains an alphabetical site index and a "what's new" section.

Key Stage 1 Class Sizes

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much Government money was invested in initiatives to reduce Key Stage 1 class sizes in (a) Bath and North East Somerset and (b) South Gloucestershire in each year from 1997 to date. [91156]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have pledged that, by September 2001, no five, six or seven year old will be taught in an infant class of more than 30 children. We have already reduced the number of children taught in such classes by some 130,000 between January 1998 and January 1999. The allocations to date of revenue and capital funding to Bath and North East Somerset and South Gloucestershire are set out in the following table.

	Revenue	Capital
1998–99
(a) Bath and North East Somerset	—	140,476
(b) South Gloucestershire	500,000	873,414
1999–2000
(a) Bath and North East Somerset	336,000	344,190
(b) South Gloucestershire	1,008,000	814,000

Laboratory Teaching

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the cost of science laboratory teaching per pupil in England and Wales in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in each of the last three years. [91288]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on the cost of science laboratory teaching per pupil is not held centrally.

LEAs (Administration Expenditure)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what his definition is of those items which at the level of the local education authority constitute spending on administration. [91073]

Ms Estelle Morris: The core administrative expenditure of a local education authority is identified on line 1.2.1.1 of the budget statement that all local education authorities are required to publish under section 52 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998. When deciding what to include on this line, a local education authority may deduct from its local schools budget the planned expenditure in relation to the matters described in paragraphs 25(a) to (j) and (l) to (u), 27, 32 and 37 of Schedule 1 to the Financing of Maintained Schools Regulations 1999 (SI 1999 No 101) which were laid before Parliament on 24 January 1999.

HEALTH

Skin Cancer

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Government have to promote awareness of the risk of skin cancer associated with exposure to the sun. [90275]

Ms Jowell: Skin cancers are largely preventable and we continue to work closely with a wide range of public bodies in raising public awareness of the sun's harmful effects and the ways in which the risks from those effects can be reduced. The Health Education Authority's annual "Sun Know How" campaign financed through the Department provides a range of information, fact sheets, posters and guidance for health professionals, for local health promotion initiatives and direct to the general public. This includes both general and targeted advice on the measures a person can take to lessen risks of sunburn. The new Ultra Violet Solar Index developed with the Meteorological Office and now provided through weather broadcasts is a further example of the work the Department is supporting to provide people with information to assess their own risk, giving forecasts on the day to day strength of the sun's rays and its capacity to burn.

For those who do develop skin cancer, even the most dangerous type, malignant melanoma, prompt recognition and diagnosis provide the best chance of successful treatment. Information for the public on how and what to recognise as the early signs of skin cancer and on when to consult their general practitioner, together with more detailed advice for health professionals plays an important role through the health promotion messages on skin cancer.

This work will continue and build on people's increasing level of awareness of the risks of skin cancer from excessive sun exposure further promoting the simple preventative measures that can be taken—cover up, seek shade particularly around mid-day, protect children and when in the sun use sunscreen.

Human Embryos

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many human embryos are currently in storage; when the licensing authority last met; and if he will list the applications made to the authority in the past year, indicating which were (a) granted and (b) refused. [90646]

Ms Jowell: Embryos may only be stored in accordance with a licence issued by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (HFEA). Clinics are required to notify the HFEA of the number of embryos placed in storage. There are some embryos which were stored before the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 came into force. Clinics were not required to notify the HFEA of these.

According to the most recent verified information held by the HFEA, between 1 August 1991 and 31 March 1997 the number of embryos put into storage during the course of IVF treatment cycles was 144,297.

The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority last met on 24 June 1999. All licensing decisions are made by Licence Committees which comprise at least three to five HFEA members. The Licensing Committee last met on 8 July 1999.

Over the period July 1998 to June 1999 the HFEA received a total of 126 applications for licences. No applications were rejected. The applications granted were as follows:

Treatment Service Centres—licence renewals: 105
Treatment Service Centres—new applications: 6
Research licences—licence renewals: 10
Research licences—new applications: 5

In total, 92 of the 126 licences granted included provision for storage of embryos. Out of these, 77 were issued to treatment service centres and 15 of these licences were issued exclusively for research purposes.

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) pursuant to paragraph 9.11 of the White Paper: "Reducing Health Inequalities: An Action Report", how strong local support is to be defined in respect of the fluoridation of water supplies; and by what mechanisms this support will be measured; [90512]

(2) if he will indemnify water companies which are obliged to add fluoride to water supplies under his proposals against legal claims made by their customers in respect of perceived side-effects; [90513]

(3) what assessment he has made of the extent to which water company operational responsibilities and local authority boundaries coincide; [90511]

Ms Jowell: As the White Paper indicates, we have commissioned a review of fluoride and health. If it is confirmed that there are benefits to health from fluoridation and no significant risks we would consult the water industry about indemnities and any constraints imposed by the water distribution network. We would then submit to Parliament proposals for amendment to Sections 87 to 91 of the Water Industries Act 1991, which would show how we consider public opinion should be measured and the extent of the public support necessary before a water company would be required to fluoridate.

Correspondence

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to provide a substantive answer to the question from the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge tabled on 13 April (ref 80286). [91726]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 15 July.

Primary Care Groups (Management Allowances)

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are (a) the maximum and (b) the minimum per capita management allowances for 1999–2000 paid to primary care groups in England. [91727]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not yet available centrally.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EU Codes of Conduct

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) of 20 January 1999, Official Report, column 506, on the European Commission, if he will make a statement on progress made on drawing up the three Codes of Conduct. [90744]

Ms Quin: Two of the three Codes of Conduct (those governing the conduct of Commissioners and relations between Commissioners and their Departments) were adopted in March. They are available on the internet at:
http//europa.eu.int/comm/codesofconduct/index—en.htm.

The third Code, on the conduct of Commission staff, is still being negotiated.

Intergovernmental Conferences

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the procedures through which access is permitted to tape recordings of intergovernmental conferences. [90702]

Ms Quin: The Presidency and Council Secretariat are the only bodies which are allowed access to the tape recordings of intergovernmental conferences.

Gibraltar

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to invoke Article 227 against Spain in respect of delays at the border with Gibraltar. [91245]

Ms Quin: We continue to press the Commission to take action to ensure that Spain fulfils its EU obligations in respect of traffic crossing the Gibraltar/Spain border. We take every opportunity to make clear to Spain that the current delays are unacceptable. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will be raising the issue with members of the Commission.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the European Commission concerning the obstruction of movement between Spain and Gibraltar. [90143]

Ms Quin: Our Permanent Representative to the EU, Sir S. Wall, wrote to the President of the European Commission on this subject on 11 February, and again on 22 June. Our Permanent Representative was in regular contact with the Commission in the intervening period.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what data he has collated on the expulsion of non-Serbian inhabitants from the Sanjak region; and if he will make a statement. [91232]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Although we do not keep extensive data, our Embassy in Sarajevo noted reports that by May of this year, almost 16,000 refugees from the Sanjak had arrived in Sarajevo. Other reports suggest that the FRY authorities used emergency powers to intimidate non-Serbs into leaving the region for Bosnia, and have made the possibility of their return very difficult.

We support the right of return for all displaced persons in the region regardless of their ethnic background.

Alexander Nikitin

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has made to the Russian authorities concerning the case of Alexander Nikitin. [91721]

Ms Quin: The Foreign Secretary raised Nikitin's case when he visited Murmansk on 3 March. I raised the subject with the Russian ambassador in October. As EU Presidency, we led representations to the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs about his case on 24 February last year. We are following his case, and are ready to raise the issue again should this be necessary.

Mr. Michael Ashcroft

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will conduct an inquiry into the disclosure of Foreign and Commonwealth Office documents referred to in press reports on 13 July, relating to Mr. Michael Ashcroft; [91544]

(2) if Special Advisers in his Department had access to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office documents referred to in press reports on 13 July relating to Mr. Michael Ashcroft. [91547]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: An inquiry was instituted on 13 July into the circumstances of the leak. We need to await the result of that inquiry. The rules applying to Ministers as regards access to papers of a previous Administration also apply to Special Advisers.

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the disclosure of Foreign and Commonwealth Office documents referred to in press reports on 13 July, relating to Mr. Michael Ashcroft, was authorised by Ministers. [91545]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Ministers did not authorise the disclosure of the documents referred to, nor were they aware in advance of the unauthorised release of official documents.

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Foreign and Commonwealth Office documents relating to Mr. Michael Ashcroft referred to in press reports of 13 July were disclosed by (a) Departmental Special Advisers, (b) another third party with the knowledge of Departmental Special Advisers and (c) other means. [91546]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are not aware who disclosed these documents. An inquiry is being conducted.

TREASURY

Gold

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for the timing of further sales of British gold reserves; and if he will make a statement. [91771]

Ms Hewitt: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin) on 7 May 1999, Official Report, column 485.

ECOFIN Council

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the ECOFIN Council held in Brussels on 12 July; and if he will make a statement. [91824]

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the ECOFIN Council held in Brussels on 14 July; and if he will make a statement. [91849]

Ms Hewitt: The programme for the Finnish Presidency was discussed in open debate and given a broad welcome.

There was discussion of economic and financial issues arising in the draft common strategy for Ukraine.

There was a discussion of the economic and financial aspects of the crises in Kosovo and the Western Balkans. A mandate for the Presidency for the 13 July High Level group was agreed.

There was general endorsement of the key elements of a Presidency proposal on the guarantee from the Community Budget for EIB loans to third countries.

A technical report on the provision of statistics in the euro area was agreed and published.

Two presidency reports on the implementation of OLAF (the European Anti-Fraud Office) and the appointment of a supervisory Committee were considered. Following slight amendment, the Reports were approved.

The Commission made a brief presentation of the draft decision on Own Resources, adopted by the Commission last week. The Presidency said it would proceed swiftly to a more detailed examination by the Council.

With regard to VAT on labour intensive services, Coreper was asked to reach agreement on a list of such services in time for agreement on the proposal at ECOFIN on 8 October.

Venture Capital Bank

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his plans for establishing a state-owned venture capital bank under the PFI, indicating the proposals for accountability to Parliament. [91689]

Mr. Milburn: There are no plans for a state investment bank. I will be announcing the Government's response to Sir Malcolm Bates's report on the PFI shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90531]

Mr. Morley: MAFF has not commissioned any new internal surveys separated by gender, race, disability or age since June 1997. It is an area which is kept constantly under review.

MAFF established a database of information relating to the ethnic origin of staff in 1989. The information is collected voluntarily and is updated annually. The database currently holds information on 95 per cent. of staff.

MAFF undertook a Disability Survey of all staff in 1996. All new staff are issued with a Disability Questionnaire and staff can provide new or updated information at any time.

MAFF has records on gender, race, disability and age for each member of staff which are used to provide statistical data on the composition of the work force, performance and promotion, location etc.

Abattoirs

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect upon small abattoirs of imposing full-time veterinary supervision; and if he will make a statement. [R] [90389]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 19 January 1999, Official Report, column 454.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the cost implications to abattoirs of full-time veterinary supervision; and if he will make a statement. [R] [90385]

Mr. Rooker: Based on the current size and structure of the meat production and processing industry in Great Britain, it is estimated by the Meat Hygiene Service that it will be necessary to secure the services of an additional 300 Official Veterinary Surgeons in order to bring veterinary supervision levels in licensed fresh red meat and poultry meat plants (ie slaughterhouses, cutting plants and cold stores) up to the levels required by the EU meat hygiene Directives. In accordance with EU rules, the costs of this additional veterinary supervision, estimated at £21 million in a full year, will have to be recovered from plant operators in the normal way. However, given the shortage of veterinarians willing to undertake meat hygiene work in the UK, full compliance with EU requirements is not possible immediately and it may be some years before the required levels and frequency of veterinary supervision is achieved in all licensed plants.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of traceability in (a) craft abattoirs and (b) plant abattoirs. [R] [90388]

Mr. Rooker: The traceability and accurate identification of individual carcases throughout the slaughter process depends on the integrity of the commercial service offered by the slaughterhouse rather than its size.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the role which small abattoirs will play in the future of the British meat industry. [R] [90387]

Mr. Rooker: The Government recognise the valuable contribution which small abattoirs make to the rural economy and will do what it can to encourage such businesses, consistent with the need to protect public health and with EU legislation.

Set-aside

Mr. Reed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of agricultural land in Leicestershire is currently subject to set-aside; and what was the annual cost to public funds in the last year for which figures are available. [91175]

Mr. Rooker: The area of set-aside in Leicestershire on claims made in 1998 under the Arable Area Payments Scheme (AAPS) was 6,501 ha, or just over 6 per cent. of the total area claimed for. But because not all agricultural land is either eligible or claimed for under AAPS, the proportion of set-aside in relation to agricultural land in the country as a whole is estimated at around 3 per cent. Comparable figures for 1999 are not yet available.

At the 1998 payment rate, the payment from the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund for this area of set-aside would have been £1,962,000.

Milk Marque

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on Milk Marque's application to expand into processing milk products. [91413]

Mr. Rooker: In his statement of 6 July, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry stated that Milk Marque, while it remains a monopoly supplier of raw milk to the processing sector, should not be allowed to extend its milk processing activities in the way planned. He therefore asked the Director General of Fair Trading to seek undertakings from Milk Marque that it would not take any further steps towards making or carrying out any agreement to acquire or build processing plant without prior agreement by the Director General.

BSE

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones), of 21 January 1999, Official Report, column 574, on BSE, if he will make a statement on the results to date of random sampling for BSE of cows slaughtered under the over thirty months scheme [91477]

Mr. Rooker: The first stage of the survey is now complete. Between January and March a total of 4,163 heads were collected from cattle slaughtered in the Over Thirty Month Scheme. In accordance with SEACs wishes, the sample was not random but cattle that were five years of age or older were targeted. This was to ensure that we were sampling cattle that were most likely to be close to clinical onset and would therefore be positive by examination of brain tissue, if infected.

Of the brains removed, a total of 3,951 were in a suitable condition for examination. So far we only have results of histopathological examinations. These examinations have identified a total of 18 positive and 3,933 negative brains. We are not yet in a position to interpret the data fully because we await the results of two other diagnostic tests and a statistical analysis of the age structure of animals slaughtered under the OTM Scheme.

Cloned Animals

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what criteria are used for determining the age of cloned animals; and if he will make a statement. [91732]

Mr. Rooker: The age of a cloned animal is determined from the date of its birth. There have been suggestions backed up by recently published results, albeit based on a very small sample, that animals cloned from adult cells may be genetically older than their birth age. Further research, and the passage of time, will be needed to determine whether cloned animals do have a shorter life span.

Mink

Angela Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the circumstances under which mink carcases may be disposed of at (a) landfill sites and (b) incinerators. [90074]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 15 July 1999]: The Animal By-Products Order 1999 requires animal by-products, such as mink carcases, to be disposed of by one of a number of routes including incineration. Burial, including landfill, is permitted only where the animal by-product is in a place where access is difficult or where the quantity of by-product and the distance to premises in which disposal is otherwise permitted do not justify transporting it.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 19 July 1999

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Serious Fraud Office

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Attorney-General when the Director of the Serious Fraud Office intends to publish her Annual Report. [92060]

The Attorney-General: The Director Serious Fraud Office has today published her Annual Report and copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Compliance

Ms Beverley Hughes: To ask the President of the Council, pursuant to her answer of 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 151, when she will publish the results of the May market research, tracking public perception of the Millennium Bug. [92123]

Mrs. Beckett: I have placed copies of the Executive Summary of the May tracking research in the Libraries of the House.

The latest results are broadly consistent with those for previous months, showing that concern among the public on this issue remains low.

During the summer recess, copies of the monthly Executive Summary will continue to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Travel Office

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, if the Commission has agreed which company should be offered the contract to operate the Travel Office following the expiry of the current contract with American Express; and if he will make a statement. [92196]

Mr. Kirkwood: The existing contract for travel agency services, currently provided by American Express, ends on 31 August 1999. Following a full open competition, the Commission has endorsed a recommendation by a tender board to award the new contract to American Express. The new contract will run from 1 September for a period of three years, although it is extendable for a further two years. Enhancements to the existing services provided have been insisted upon; for example, Eurostar tickets will be available on-site from this autumn, following the installation of a ticket machine. In addition, American Express travel consultants will, wherever possible, routinely give alternative quotations to ensure that best value for money is achieved. In the interest of the House, and therefore taxpayers, the Travel Office will also actively pursue options for further discounts and rebates from airlines and railway companies.

PRIME MINISTER

Minister without Portfolio (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish an account of the official overseas visits made by the former Minister without Portfolio during the time he held that office, listing the venue, the event, the number of officials accompanying him and the total cost of the visit to public funds. [89841]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 July 1999]: I have accounted fully for all overseas travel undertaken by Ministers, and any accompanying officials, in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on 17 June 1999, Official Report, columns 196–97. This global figure of course included overseas visits by the former Minister without Portfolio.

Listed in the table are the official overseas visits made by the former Minister without Portfolio during the period 2 May 1997 to 27 July 1998.

Date	Destination	Purpose of Visit
17–18 July 1997	Paris	Discussions on EU related matters/British Council Seminar
11 September 1997	Bonn/Munich	Bilaterals with German Ministers. Represented HM Government at meeting of the Club of Three.
10 October 1997	Rome	Address Institute of International Affairs/Bilaterals with Italian Ministers
27 November 1997	Paris	Visit to Futuroscope as Minister responsible for Millennium Dome
30 January 1998	Florence	Address European University Institute
2–3 February 1998	Brussels	Bilaterals with EU Commissioners
2–4 March 1998	Bonn	Address Seminar on Democracy and Legitimacy
8–9 May 1998	Amsterdam	Address Congress of Europe
8–9 June 1998	Paris	Address National Assembly
18–22 July 1998	Brazil	Visit on behalf of the Government to promote political and economic relations between two countries

The average cost of each visit was £1,365. All visits were fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code. On the November 1997 visit to Paris, the Minister was accompanied by an official. On other occasions he was supported by locally based diplomatic staff.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all the overseas visits since December 1998 by hon. Members funded by the Government. [89842]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 July 1999]: I have accounted fully for all overseas travel undertaken by Ministers, including members of the official party and I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) on 17 June 1999, Official Report, columns 196–97. There is, however, no systematic and central record kept of every visit made by hon. Members which has funding support from a Government source.

In exceptional circumstances, hon. Members can receive funding from Government. These can include official events where representation wider than just the Government is warranted, for example the handover ceremony of Hong Kong where the Government paid for the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Liberal Democrats to attend.

Members may also occasionally travel abroad as members of an official party observing elections in emerging democracies. The costs of such visits are usually met by the respective Government or by a national or international sponsoring organisation such as the European Union or United Nations. Again, no records are available centrally for such costs.

Since December 1998, my Office has not funded any overseas visits by hon. Members.

EC Legislation

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list proposals which have become legislation at European Community level, following the joint Franco-German letter at the Cardiff EU summit; what was the UK's policy on each proposal; and if he will make a statement. [90846]

The Prime Minister: All Community legislation is published in the Official Journal, copies of which are placed in the Library of the House. It is the Government's policy to consider each proposal on its merits, taking into account all relevant factors including the principle of subsidiarity as mentioned in the Franco-German letter to the Cardiff European Council.

The Government attach importance to the proper application of subsidiarity, which is designed to ensure that decisions are taken at the most appropriate level, be that European, national, regional or local.

Portschach

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list those developments in policy and operational practice which are consequential to the Portschach meeting. [90942]

The Prime Minister: Following informal discussion of European defence arrangements at Portschach, the United Kingdom and France agreed a joint declaration at St. Malo on 4 December 1998. Following this, the NATO Summit in Washington on 25 April 1999 agreed on ways to take forward the initiative in NATO. The European Council at Cologne issued a Declaration on 4 June 1999 committing the EU to strengthen its common European security and defence policy.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Prime Minister if progress in response to the threat of the millennium bug was discussed and an assessment of the millennium compliance of the global economy made at the recent Cologne Summit; and if he will make a statement. [91297]

The Prime Minister: The millennium bug was discussed at the G8 Summit in Cologne. It was noted that there had been real progress since the 1998 Birmingham Summit in tackling the millennium bug, but that some countries still had a lot of preparation to do. This was reflected in the strong language of the Communiqué. G8 countries agreed to maintain vigorous programmes of action and urged all other Governments to do the same. The Communiqué also highlighted the importance of contingency planning to cope with potential system failures. The G8 will maintain close co-operation among members and with others. A special G8 Conference on contingency planning will take place in the autumn.

International Legal Procedures

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals Her Majesty's Government have evaluated on the (a) creation of new institutions and (b) enhancement of existing ones in respect of the application of international legal procedures to the determination of the justification for possible interventions for humanitarian reasons, with particular reference to the relationship between such authority and considerations of national sovereignty. [91729]

The Prime Minister: I consider it hugely important that we should have a world ruled by law and by international co-operation, with the United Nations as its central pillar. We are a leading supporter of the International Court of justice, which has the central role in determining the conformity of action with international law. We are committed to working with our partners to find new ways to make the United Nations system work more effectively.

Enterprise Fund

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his announcement of a new £50 million enterprise fund on 6 July, what provision is being made for Wales. [91420]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 15 July 1999]: On 6 July, I launched a consultation on proposals for support for the creation of Regional Venture Capital Funds in England. The proposed support will form one element of a package of measures to support small and medium enterprise finance. This package will be funded through the Department of Trade and Industry's Enterprise Fund, announced in the 1998 Competitiveness White Paper (Cm 4176).

The legal basis for the new support is Sections 7 and 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. The power to provide support is a concurrent power, that is, it is shared by the Secretary of State and the devolved administrations. Each administration therefore has the power to make similar assistance available to that proposed for England. Mechanisms to support venture capital in Wales are a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Other elements of the Enterprise Fund package of measures (including the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme) will be made available by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry across the United Kingdom, in consultation with the devolved administrations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Director Disqualification

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes he intends to make to (a) section 8 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 and (b) section 83 of the Companies Act 1989. [90328]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 8 July 1999]: I have no specific intentions to amend section 8 of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 but subject to available parliamentary time it would be my intention to introduce legislation to provide for a consent order regime.

I have no intention at present to seek to amend section 83 of the Companies Act 1989.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90827]

Mr. Byers: In early 1999, DTI conducted a survey of the caring and child care responsibilities of its headquarters staff. This survey separated respondents by gender.

In addition, since June 1997 data have been collected and analysed by gender, race and disability on recruitment, the operation of the Department's staff appraisal system and special bonus scheme, its system for deploying staff within the Department and on participation rates on in-house training courses.

Information collected for the Department's Equal Opportunities Annual Report, which includes the composition of the Department and application and success rates for progression/promotion, is separated by gender, race, disability and age.

A travel to work survey was carried out in July 1997 for Victoria street area HQ staff and is currently being carried out for some dispersed HQ staff. The data are separated by gender, disability and age.

This excludes the Department's Executive Agencies.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the statutory instruments introduced into Parliament by his Department in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 which gave effect to European Union legislation. [90745]

Mr. Byers: This question cannot be answered without incurring disproportionate cost.

Research Councils (Environmental Performance)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what environmental targets he has set for the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils. [91010]

Mr. Battle: The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry does not set environmental targets additional to those set by the Environment Agency. CCLRC conforms to limits for emissions set by the Environment Agency, and has reduced its annual spending on utilities.

Airlines

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had this year with the European Commission about the proposed alliance between British Airways and American Airlines. [91218]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Shortly after I took office I met Commissioner Van Miert and discussed a number of topics including the proposed alliance between British Airways and American Airlines. Since then I have not had any discussions with the European Commission about the proposed alliance.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list each occasion since he took office when he has met (a) British Airways and (b) Virgin Atlantic to discuss the proposed British Airways alliance with American Airlines. [91221]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Since I took office I have met neither British Airways nor Virgin Atlantic to discuss the proposed British Airways alliance with American Airlines.

Business Ambassadors

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what involvement his Department has had in the Ambassadors for British Business project. [91841]

Mr. Wilson: The Ambassadors for British Business scheme was launched by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in November 1997 and was administered by the Joint Export Promotion Directorate, a joint FCO/DTI directorate in the Export Command of the DTI. It is now administered by the new unified DTI/FCO operation, British Trade International.

MOX Fuel

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to monitor the movements of the imminent shipment of MOX fuel to Japan. [90200]

Mr. Battle: As part of the security plan for the shipment of MOX to Japan, the UKAEAC control centre in the UK, which is manned 24 hours per day, will receive reports from the ships every hour, via secure communications, detailing the position of the ships.

Indonesia

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the arrangements for the provision of additional ECGD support to facilitate the completion of the Ungaren Klaten transmission lines and sub-stations contract between VA Tech Reyrole Projects and PLN of Indonesia. [92224]

Mr. Byers: I have been advised by the Export Credits Guarantee Department's Accounting Officer that, in his view, the risks involved in giving medium and long-term export credit guarantees for exports to Indonesia under Section 1(1) of the Export and Investment Guarantees Act 1991 do not currently meet ECGD's normal underwriting criteria.

In view of the importance that we attach to our relations with Indonesia, I have instructed ECGD's Accounting Office to make arrangements to provide an additional US$1.1 million of support to enable VA Tech Reyrolle Projects to undertake the necessary additional work to allow previously supplied equipment to become fully operational.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Vehicle Inspectorate

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many inspectors were employed or engaged by the Vehicle Inspectorate in each of the last 10 years; and how many vehicles were inspected in each year. [90413]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Information in a consistent form is available only for the last five years. Prior to that date the data are not available, or could be obtained only at disproportionate costs. The information for the period since 1993–94 is presented in the table.

The Vehicle Inspectorate employs testers to carry out statutory annual tests on heavy goods vehicles (HGVs), passenger service vehicles (PSVs) and some light goods vehicles (LGVs). This is a demand-led activity. Vehicle examiners (VEs) carry out enforcement inspections on all types of vehicles to check their mechanical condition and traffic examiners (TEs) check compliance with traffic regulations including weighing and tachograph charts. The Inspectorate's performance measures have, during the period covered, increasingly encouraged examiners to target those vehicles which are considered most likely to be committing offences. This has increased the effectiveness of the checks in terms of road safety and environmental protection.

[2] Includes tests and retests of HGVs, PSVs and LGVs. A vehicle may be retested more than once.

[3] Test carried out in VI's test stations designed to aid test preparation or for routine maintenance. Checks available for brake tests, headlamp aim, smoke check or multi-check.

[4] From 1995–96, voluntary brake tests were based on number of axles tested. Figures include brake checks on axles, headlamp aim checks, smoke checks and multi-checks.

[5] Figure includes vehicles inspected at the roadside and at operator's premises for mechanical condition. A vehicle will be counted in the figure for roadworthiness inspections and traffic enforcement inspections if it has been checked by both a VE and a TE.

[6] Figure includes documentation checks and weighings. Figure does not include the number of individual tachograph charts checked. TEs checked 1,417,646 tachograph charts in 1998–99.

A6 Bus Lane, Loughborough

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect the A6 bus lane at Loughborough has had on journey times for (a) buses and (b) other road traffic in its first three months. [90502]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Andrew Reed, dated 19 July 1999:

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, Glenda Jackson, has asked me to reply to your recent question about the effect the A6 bus lane in Loughborough has had on journey times for buses and other road traffic in its first three months of operation.

The bus lane between Quorn and Loughborough opened on 1st March. It operates during peak hours between 7.30 and 9.30am and 3.30 and 6.00pm on Mondays to Saturdays. Before and after surveys have been undertaken to measure queue lengths, traffic flows and delays. A full analysis of the changes is still awaited from our managing agent for the A6, but general trends can already be identified.

Bus journey time reliability has increased by 50% on most journeys in the morning peak and the journey time between Quorn and Loughborough has been reduced by up to 7 minutes on a 15 minutes minimum journey.

The effects on journey times for other traffic are less clear and data is still being assessed but initial indications are that overall journey times have not increased. In addition, there appears to have been an improvement in general traffic flow into Loughborough during the morning peak; a 20% increase in vehicle throughout has been achieved between 8am and 9am. It is considered that this is due to the more ordered nature of the queue towards the A6/Shelthorpe Road traffic signals.

A full report on the A6 Quorn to Loughborough bus lane is being prepared and will be available shortly and I will ensure that you receive a copy. In the meantime, if you wish to discuss any aspect further, the Highways Agency's Route Manager for this A6 scheme is Peter Adams. He can be contacted at our office at Broadway, Broad Street, Birmingham, B15 1BL, or by telephone on 0121 678 8215.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90829]

Mr. Meale: In September 1998 the central core of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions commissioned diversity consultants Pearn Kandola to conduct an independent evaluation of the Performance Management and Appraisal System. This work involved an analysis of performance and promotion markings of grades below the Senior Civil Service by gender; ethnic origin; disability, and part-time/full-time status. A copy of the report is available in the Library.

In the Department's Executive Agencies the following specific projects have been commissioned:

The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA) commissioned Dr. Marie Stewart of Taylor Stewart Associates to review the application of their equal opportunities policies in two offices in the Agency's Local Office Network. This work commenced in early 1999 and included a review of statistical information by gender, race, disability and part-time working patterns.

The Driving Standards Agency (DSA) have undertaken two internal surveys of their staff during 1999 on ethnicity and disability.

During 1997, the Highways Agency audited its previous appraisal system to ensure that it was fair regardless of gender, ethnicity and disability. In 1998 the Institute of Employment Studies were commissioned to produce a report as a result of the review on the introduction of the new appraisal system. Analysis included distribution of performance markings by gender and ethnicity. In the same year, the pay and reward team conducted an audit of performance pay and bonuses which included data on gender, ethnicity and disability.

The Planning Inspectorate conducted a staff attitude survey which was categorized by gender and disability.

DETR(C) and the Department's Executive Agencies continue to use their own management information systems to produce statistics by gender, ethnicity, disability and part-time/full-time status on an annual basis.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91064]

Mr. Meale: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 301.

Green Ministers Committee

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what matters were discussed, what decisions were made and which departments were represented by officials at the meeting of Green Ministers on 6 July; and if he will make a statement. [91249]

Mr. Meacher: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Burgon) on 16 July 1999, Official Report, column 341. The first annual report of the Green Ministers Committee, due to be published later this month, will set out the achievements and future plans of the Committee.

Leasehold Reform

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many officials in his Department are working on leasehold reform proposals. [91260]

Mr. Raynsford: Currently, two officials work purely on leasehold reform and a further seven devote a significant proportion of their time to this area of work. We plan to expand this team further.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of leasehold properties as a percentage of the total. [91261]

Mr. Raynsford: The most recent estimates from the Survey of English Housing are that there were approximately 1.78 million owner-occupiers in England in 1997–98 who were leaseholders, representing 12.8 per cent. of all owner-occupiers.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made on his leasehold reform proposals. [91259]

Mr. Raynsford: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) on 13 July 1999, Official Report, column 139.

Lead Shot

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the respondents to the recent consultation paper on the use of lead shot over wetlands. [91274]

Mr. Meale: My Department received 270 representations from members of the public in addition to those organisations that are listed in the table.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what evidence his Department has assessed linking mortality of wildfowl and the ingestion of lead shot. [91262]

Mr. Meale: The toxic effects of ingested lead on birds have been known for over a century, and reported from many sources around the world. It would not be possible to list all the published research, but a selection of key papers is listed.

Local Authority Elections

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage more people to stand for election to their local authorities. [91299]

Mr. Meale: Our proposals for new rewarding roles for councillors and for addressing some of the potential disincentives to serve on councils, as set out in our White Paper: "Modern Local Government—In Touch with the People" (Cm 4014), will we believe encourage more people to stand for election to their local authorities.

Home Building

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will estimate how many new homes will be built in the United Kingdom by the year 2006 (a) in total, (b) on green-field sites and (c) on brown-field sites; [91318]

(2) if he will estimate how many new homes will be built within Lancashire on (a) green-field and (b) brown-field sites over the next 10 years; [91317]

(3) if he will estimate how many new homes will be built on green-field sites over the next 10 years, broken down by region. [91316]

Mr. Raynsford: My Department does not estimate the number of new homes to be built. Estimates of housing requirements are derived in Regional Planning Guidance following public examination.

The Government's target is to provide 60 per cent. of new homes on previously developed land or by conversion of existing buildings. They have asked Regional Planning Bodies and local planning authorities to set their own recycling targets consistent with delivery of the national target. To assist in this process, my Department has established the first phase of the National Land Use Database to provide a comprehensive assessment of previously developed vacant and derelict land, and other developed land that may be available for recycling.

PPG3

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the new PPG3 will be fully operational. [91412]

Mr. Raynsford: Over 600 responses have been received to the consultation draft of Planning Policy Guidance note 3 on Housing, which are now being analysed. I expect to issue the final version after the recess. In the meantime, the draft PPG3 can be cited as a material consideration in determining planning applications although it will have full effect only when the final version has been published.

Post Bus Services

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for the development of Post Bus services under the proposals for the reform of the Post Office. [91506]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Post Bus services are principally an operational matter for the Post Office. We recognise, however, that such services can provide important transport links for people in rural areas, and the Countryside Agency provides grants from the Rural Transport Development Fund towards the costs of starting up new Post Bus services in rural areas of England.

Buses

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what representations he has received regarding extensions to the 42-day notice period for bus service variations; and if he will pay compensation to operators compelled to continue running uneconomic services; [91478]

(2) what studies he has commissioned into the commercial effects of repealing section 92(1) of the Transport Act 1985 or otherwise relaxing local authorities' duty not to inhibit competition in bus services; [91417]

(3) what representations he has received regarding compensation for bus operators excluded from routes or areas under a re-regulated Quality Contract. [91418]

Ms Glenda Jackson: These are among the matters on which we have consulted widely with the bus industry, local authorities and other interested parties in our publication "From Workhorse to Thoroughbred—A Better Role for Bus Travel". Several hundred responses have been received in total, and they will be carefully considered as we develop firm proposals.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to set national criteria for determining the social necessity of uncommercial passenger bus services. [91408]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. We intend that decisions about subsidising local bus services should remain a matter for the judgment of individual local authorities in the context of their local transport plans.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of 1999 rural bus challenge funds were allocated to projects in the (a) North West, (b) North East, (c) Yorkshire and the Humber, (d) West Midlands, (e) East Midlands, (f) Eastern, (g) South West and (h) South East Government Office regions. [91411]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The invitation to local authorities to submit bids for the 1999 Rural Bus Challenge was issued on 2 July. The closing date is 1 October 1999 and we expect to announce decisions by early December.

The breakdown of awards under last year's Rural Bus Challenge, as announced on 16 December 1998 are:

Area	£	Percentage
(a) North West	1,154,510	10
(b) North East	1,863,850	16
(c) Yorkshire and the Humber	572,200	5
(d) West Midlands	361,490	3
(e) East Midlands	3,485,190	31
(f) Eastern	1,646,850	14
(g) South West	1,265,604	11
(h) South East	1,069,000	9
Total	11,418,694	99[1]

[1] Due to rounding

Urban and Rural White Paper

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish (1) the Urban White Paper; [91393]

(2) the Rural White Paper. [91392]

Mr. Meale: My right hon. Friend will publish the Urban and Rural White Paper when work has been completed. We expect this will be within the next twelve months.

Pensioner Concessionary Travel

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the total cost to local authorities of introducing half-fare bus travel for all pensioners. [91449]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Our estimate of the additional costs of introducing in England our proposed minimum standard for concessionary bus fares for pensioners is approximately £25 million a year.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the half-fare concessions scheme for pensioners will apply to forms of local passenger transport other than buses. [91410]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Our proposal for a national minimum half-fare scheme for pensioners applies only to bus travel. It will remain open to local authorities to provide concessionary travel on other forms of local transport if they judge it right to do so in the light of their local policies and circumstances.

Bus Drivers

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on driver recruitment for bus operators; and what plans he has to introduce new bus driver instruction regulations. [91489]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Ensuring that they have sufficient drivers to provide their services is primarily a matter for individual bus companies. We recognise however that there have been driver recruitment and retention difficulties in some areas and are discussing the issues involved with the industry and the relevant agencies.

As stated in our policy document "From Workhorse to Thoroughbred: A Better Role for Bus Travel", we recognise the importance of driving standards and training. We intend to improve driving standards by specifying a training syllabus for drivers and by introducing a statutory register of bus and coach driving instructors. We are holding discussions with the industry and intend to publish detailed proposals later this year.

Quality Partnership

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what criteria he will use to evaluate the performance of Quality Partnership; [91322]

(2) if employer-provided bus services will be required to meet Quality Partnership standards before being permitted to use Quality Partnership facilities. [91505]

Ms Glenda Jackson: It will be for local authorities to decide whether to introduce Statutory Quality Partnerships, once the legislation is in place, and to evaluate their effectiveness. Our proposals relate only to local bus services as defined in the Transport Act 1985.

Quality Contracts

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how he will determine whether Quality Contracts are necessary in a local authority area; [91405]

(2) how many Quality Contract pilot schemes he intends to approve, and when. [91323]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Quality Contracts for buses require primary legislation. As we said in our consultation document "From Workhorse to Thoroughbred—A Better Role for Bus Travel", we expect to give a very limited number of approvals initially to allow the Quality Contract approach to be tested. The broad criteria were set out in that document.

Public Transport Timetables

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the national public transport timetable information system to be available. [91324]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Good progress is being made with the relevant parties, building on existing local and national information sources, including the National Rail Enquiry Service. We expect to be able to introduce a national, multi-modal information system in the course of next year.

Household Waste

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many landfill sites (a) in Greater London and (b) outside Greater London receive household waste from Greater London. [91500]

Mr. Meale: This information is not available centrally. The Municipal Waste Survey collects data from waste disposal authorities about the amount of municipal waste sent to landfill, but does not collect information about the individual landfill sites used.

Transmission Masts

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what national planning guidelines there are on the siting of transmission masts on schools and colleges; and if he will make a statement. [91501]

Mr. Raynsford: Planning policy guidance on telecommunications development is set out in Planning Policy Guidance note 8 (revised December 1992), supplemented by DETR Circular 4/99 "Planning for Telecommunications". In addition, my Department has published in March 1996 a Code of Best Practice for local planning authorities and telecommunications code system operators on telecommunications prior approval procedures as applied to mast/tower development.

My Department has also issued for consultation the draft of a circular on land use planning and electro-magnetic fields (EMFs) prepared jointly with the Department of Health. The circular provides draft advice to local planning authorities in deciding applications for development giving rise to EMFs, such as telecommunications base stations. We are considering the responses received.

Laboratory Accidents

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents have been recorded in science laboratories in the last 10 years in (a) schools and (b) higher educational establishments. [91278]

Mr. Meale: The Health and Safety Executive's records for the years 1989–90 to 1998–99 show that there were 1,297 reportable accidents in school laboratories and 457 reportable accidents in laboratories in higher and further education establishments. These data include accidents to both students and employees.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the annual volume of carbon dioxide emissions which would be eliminated by the use of a 100MW tidal electric power plant. [91646]

Mr. Meale: A 100MW tidal electricity generating plant would make an annual carbon dioxide saving of between 80,000 and 200,000 tonnes of carbon dioxide depending upon the type of fossil fuel fired electricity generating plant displaced.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) English Partnerships and (b) Rural Development Commission offices (i) have closed and (ii) will close as a result of the creation of the regional development agencies. [91512]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 15 July 1999]: 14 offices were transferred from English Partnerships to the Regional Development Agencies on 1 April 1999 under the Transfer Schemes made in accordance with the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998. None of these has yet closed, but three are expected to do so.

7 offices were transferred as assets from the Rural Development Commission to the Regional Development Agencies on 1 April 1999 under the Transfer Schemes. Three of these have closed and one other is expected to do so.

Ministerial Engagements

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the official engagements of each of his Ministers for the week beginning (a) Monday 12 July, (b) Monday 19 July and (c) Monday 26 July. [91527]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 15 July 1999]: It is not the normal practice of Governments to give details of forthcoming engagements.

Regional Offices (Brussels)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) regional development agencies and (b) regional chambers have offices in Brussels. [91516]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 15 July 1999]: Decisions on the establishment of offices in Brussels are a matter for the Regional Development Agencies and regional chambers themselves. I understand that no Agencies or regional chambers have dedicated offices in Brussels. However, two Agencies and two regional chambers share or have access to an office there.

Regional Development Agencies (Relocation)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) English Partnerships staff and (b) Rural Development Commission staff (i) have moved offices and (ii) will move offices as a result of the creation of the regional development agencies. [91513]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 15 July 1999]: Three hundred and seventy four staff transferred from English Partnerships to the Regional Development Agencies on 1 April 1999 under the Transfer Schemes made in accordance with the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998. Of these staff, 61 have moved offices, and 43 others are expected to do so.

One hundred and four staff transferred from the Rural Development Commission to the Regional Development Agencies on 1 April 1999 under the Transfer Schemes. Of these staff, 29 have moved offices, and 25 others are expected to do so.

New Homes (Lancashire)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many new homes were built in Lancashire in 1998. [91586]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 16 July 1999]: It is estimated that a total of 4,465 dwellings were completed in Lancashire in 1998.

Planning

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to devolve powers to local authorities in relation to planning decisions. [91587]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 16 July 1999]: Most planning applications are determined by local authorities. My right hon. Friend has various powers in planning legislation. For example, he can make orders granting a general planning permission for specified categories of development and can make regulations setting fee levels for different types of application. Such powers are used primarily to ensure a consistent national approach to planning matters and we have no plans to devolve them to local authorities.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90676]

Mr. Meale: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Eleven executive non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) sponsored by this Department have been wound-up since 1 May 1997; nine Urban Development Corporations (UDCs)—Birmingham Heartlands, Black Country, London Docklands, Merseyside, Plymouth, Trafford Park, Teesside and Tyne & Wear, which were wound-up on 30 June 1998, and Sheffield which was wound-up on 30 June 1997; North Hull Housing Action Trust was wound-up on 28 February 1999; and the United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board was wound-up on 19 April 1999 and its functions were brought into DETR. In addition, the British Board of Agrement became an autonomous body, no longer classified as an NDPB, on 1 April 1999. Four advisory NDPBs have been wound up since 1 May 1997; the Assessment Panel for Construction Research wound up on 14 July 1997, the Advisory Committee on Plant and Machinery wound up on 14 May 1998, the Local Government Staff Commission (England) wound up on 12 May 1998, and the Export Action Group for Building Materials wound up on 31 May 1999.

(b) The Rural Development Commission (RDC), which is non-operational at present, is due to be wound up in the Autumn of 1999.

(c)(i) The RDC's programmes and most of its staff transferred to the Countryside Agency, which was formerly known as the Countryside Commission, and the Regional Development Agencies (RDAs) on 1 April 1999; some of the functions and staff of English Partnerships also transferred to the RDAs on 1 April 1999; and the Commission for the New Towns was merged with English Partnerships, although the two bodies remain legally separate, on 1 April 1999 for operational purposes. (ii) No bodies have had their functions transferred to a democratically elected body.

(d) Apart from the Countryside Agency, none have been renamed but continue to perform a similar function.

(e) Details of other NDPBs in existence on 1 May 1997 sponsored by this Department are listed in "Public Bodies 1998".

Eight executive and six advisory NDPBs have been established since 1 May 1997. The eight executive bodies are the Regional Development Agencies (RDAs); One NorthEast, North West Development Agency, Yorkshire Forward, Advantage West Midlands, East Midlands Development Agency, East of England Development Agency, South West of England Regional Development Agency and South East England Development Agency. The six advisory NDPBs are the Commission for Integrated Transport, the Committee on Chemicals and Materials on Construction for use in Public Water Supplies and Swimming Pools, the Expert Group on Airborne Particles, the Expert Group on Cryptosporidium in Water Supplies, the Expert Panel on Sustainable Development Education, and the Zoos Forum. In addition, Docklands Light Railway was reclassified as an executive NDPB on 1 April 1998 to enable it to receive grant-in-aid direct from the Department following the wind-up of London Docklands Development Corporation.

This Department currently sponsors 55 NDPBs—33 executive and 22 advisory bodies.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to sell 51 per cent. of National Air Traffic Services Ltd. [91854]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government issued a consultation document in October 1998 seeking views on our proposal for a public private partnership for NATS. The period for responses to that consultation has now closed and we are considering those received. We will make a detailed announcement on the way forward in due course.

Aircraft Safety

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safety checks are made to guarantee the integrity of wiring in commercial aircraft. [91309]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Wiring installations are subject to detailed inspection and testing at the time of aircraft manufacture.

Subsequently, the Civil Aviation Authority sets comprehensive maintenance requirements which ensure the continued airworthiness of all UK-registered commercial aircraft; this includes checks of the external physical appearance of wiring looms at scheduled intervals. In addition, electrical continuity checks are made on affected electrical circuits whenever modifications are made to the electrical system.

Any serious faults in electrical wiring that occurred during aircraft operations would normally be detected because they are accompanied by system faults and warnings. In such cases, investigations will be made specifically directed at the relevant wiring. Individual electrical circuits are protected by automatic current limiting devices designed to isolate the associated circuit in the event of a current overload.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Kosovo

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance her Department is giving to the re-building of the civil administration in Kosovo; and if she will make a statement. [91293]

Clare Short: Our aim is to provide timely help to meet the basic safety and welfare needs of all Kosovars, while assisting in rapid stabilisation through the establishment of an effective and well-co-ordinated international civil administration. We provided a support package, including funds and equipment, to the UN Special Representative's Office. Through the World Health Organisation, we are helping the UN Mission in Kosovo to establish a central health administration. Our support includes experts, logistical support, essential equipment and supplies.

The UN has recently requested qualified staff to build up the UN Civil Administration in Kosovo. The Government will shortly decide their response.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if she will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies her Department currently is responsible for. [90679]

Clare Short: The information requested is as follows:

(a) None.

(b) The Crown Agents Holding & Realisation Board and the India Family Pension Funds Body of Commissioners are expected to be disbanded within the next year.

(c)(i) None.

(c)(ii) None.

(d) None.

(e) In addition to those listed at (b) the following bodies were in existence on 1 May 1997 and remain unchanged:

The Advisory Committee on Overseas Economic and Social Research

The Overseas Service Pensions Scheme Advisory Board

The Know How Fund Advisory Board

The Commonwealth Scholarships Commission in the United Kingdom.

(f) One new body has been created since 1 May 1997—The Development Awareness Working Group.

(g) My Department is currently responsible for seven non-departmental public bodies.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list for (a) her Department and (b) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register, how many vehicles are currently (i) owned and (ii) leased; if she will indicate their (1) fuel types and (2) engine cubic capacities; how many of the vehicles due for replacement by (A) her Department and (B) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register will be replaced in (x) 1999–2000, (y) 2000–1 and (z) 2001–2 by vehicles using (a1) petrol, (b2) diesel, (c3) natural gas, (d4) electric batteries and (e5) other; and how much her Department plans to spend in each year on vehicle replacements. [90690]

Clare Short: We own 50 vehicles used in the administration of the aid programme overseas. The other information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Investment

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, how much of the Church's investment is in the defence and military hardware industries. [90234]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Commissioners do not invest in companies whose main business is the manufacture of armaments. The Commissioners' main investments in defence-related companies are presently in GEC and GKN. In addition, some of the companies in which the Commissioners hold shares may have small defence-related interests, ranging from electrical and electronic systems to engineering components, but these companies would not be described as military and certainly cannot be classified as armaments.

Millennium Celebrations

Mr. Pike: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what steps the Commissioners are taking to support initiatives from the parochial ministry to celebrate the millennium. [90233]

Mr. Stuart Bell: I would encourage every parish to take steps to mark the Millennium year as the 2000th anniversary of the birth of Jesus Christ. Now that the funding for the Faith Zone at the Dome is secure, I hope my hon. Friend will encourage churches in his own constituency to see that, whatever happens at the Dome, local community activity is an essential part of a Christian marking of the Millennium. I understand from the Churches' Millennium Office that they are very encouraged by the level of activity in churches up and down the country.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Market Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the title and purpose of each item of market and opinion research commissioned by or through his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997 stating in each case whether or not the results were published. [89694]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 5 July 1999]: The Department conducts or commissions market or opinion research only when it is justified by the specific needs of a particular policy or programme and when this is the most economical, efficient and effective way to achieve the purpose. Consulting and involving the public helps inform both policy formulation and the delivery of better quality public services. Responsive public services are an important part of the Modernising Government initiative.

For the available information, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply the then Minister of State, Home Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 23 February 1998, Official Report, column 50, and the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) on 3 July 1998, Official Report, column 287. There are nine additional items to add to this list:

1. A study of voter opinion looking into the possibility of introducing a Belgian style electoral system for elections to the European Parliament. The results from this research have been placed in the Library.
2. Planning, development, tracking and measuring the effectiveness of publicity campaigns, including:
   (a) Fire Safety Attitude and Behaviour Monitor November 1998 (England and Wales).
   (b) Fire Safety Christmas 1998 Campaign Evaluation (January 1999).
   (c) A study of voter's experience in the recent European Parliamentary elections, including qualitative creative campaign development (March 1999) and Quantitative pre/post tracking (June 1999).
   (d) A study of Electoral Registration advertising involving quantitative campaign tracking before and after the campaign (July and October 1998).
   (e) Local Crime Reduction Partnerships advertising involving quantitative campaign evaluation (March 1999).

   This research was not published, but results may sometimes appear in press releases.
3. National Fire Safety Centre Branding Research (June 1999).
4. Police Information Technology Organisation (PITO) staff survey, in two phases, to gauge staff perceptions of the organisation.
5. Police Information Technology Organisation survey of police customers in England and Wales to establish a measure of the level of satisfaction with PITO's service. PITO's Annual Report for 1998–99, a copy of which is in the Library, reports the outcome under Performance against Key Performance Indicators.
6. Quarterly analysis of United Kingdom Passport Agency Customer Service.
7. Market research into clothing trends (October 1997) to investigate (by public opinion poll and other means) which trade names would encourage people to buy prison manufactured clothing.
8. On-going focus group research with Young Offenders to learn about their background and experiences.
9. Further 1999 Forensic Science staff survey published in the Forensic Science Service Magazine.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 1999, Official Report, column 156, on the private finance initiative, if he will list (i) the amounts by which the contract payments were reduced, (ii) the reason for each reduction, (iii) the dates on which the reductions were made and (iv) the period of the contract they relate to; if he will list the decisions on further reductions in contract payments which are pending; and if he will make a statement. [90711]

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91065]

Mr. Straw: I refer to the reply given to you on 15 April, Official Report, column 316. A further 11 'Named Day' parliamentary questions were answered by my Department up to, and including, the 14 April 1999 and received a substantive reply on the day requested. This does not alter the figure of 75.4 per cent. as previously stated.

Prisoners (Licence Period)

Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the remission rates applied to prison sentences; and what monitoring his Department undertakes of remission rates in other European countries. [90989]

Mr. Boateng: Provisions in Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 abolished remission. In the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 13 July, Official Report, column 109, I set out the new arrangements under the Act. We have no current plans to change these arrangements.

The Government do not currently monitor the release arrangements in other European countries. However, at its meeting in June, the Council of Europe's European Committee on Crime Problems mandated the Council on Penological Co-operation to examine the question of early (conditional) release (parole).

Terms of reference for this examination have yet to be drawn up.

Racial Incidents

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many reported racial incidents there were by region in each year since 1995; and how many led to a conviction. [91165]

Mr. Straw: Available information about the number of racist incidents recorded by each police force since 1995 is set out in the table. These are based on the Association of Chief Police Officers definition of a racial incident

"any incident in which it appears to the reporting or investigating officer that the complaint involves an element of racial motivation; or any incident which includes an allegation of racial motivation made by any person."

Last year, a breakdown of the number of racist incidents recorded by the police in each police area was included for the first time in the Home Office publication "Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System", a copy of which is in the Library. The statistics for 1998–99 will be published in the autumn.

The Stephen Lawrence Inquiry recommended that these incidents are referred to as "racist" incidents and that simpler and clearer definition should be used;

"A racist incident is any incident which is perceived to be racist by the victim or any other person."

This definition was adopted by all police forces on 29 April 1999.

Information on convictions arising from racist incidents is not available.

Freedom of Information

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from organisations concerned with health and safety on the draft Freedom of Information Bill. [90809]

Mr. Straw: Up to and including 12 July 1999 I had received one representation on the draft Freedom of Information Bill from an organisation concerned with health and safety. This was from the Health and Safety Commission and Health and Safety Executive (dated 7 July) and was a contribution to the public consultation exercise.

The Health and Safety Commission/Executive expressed views primarily on the extent and nature of the exemptions.

When the pre-legislative scrutiny and public consultation exercise have been completed, the Government will respond to the reports of the Select Committees and the submissions of the consultees. Consultation responses will be made publicly available at this time.

Police Numbers (Sussex)

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers there were in Sussex in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 1999. [91450]

Mr. Boateng: Information on police numbers is collected twice a year, in March and September. The information available is set out in the table:

Date	Number of officers
31 March 1997	3,085
31 March 1999	2,847

The number of police officers in each force is a matter for local determination by the chief constable and the police authority. It is for chief officers to decide on the balance between numbers of police officers and civilian support staff. The Sussex Police increased civilian numbers by 244 between March 1997 and March 1999.

Transsexuals

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) of 14 April 1999, Official Report, column 257, what representations he has received regarding the working group on the status of transsexual people; what meetings he and his officials have had with groups representing transsexual people; and what plans he has made for such meetings in the future. [91294]

Mr. Straw: The Working Group on Transsexual People invited written submissions from interested parties. To date it has received representations from 10 organisations and 28 members of the public. A number of hon. Members have also written to me about the work of the Group. In addition, the Minister of State, Home Office, my right hon. Friend, Lord Williams of Mostyn, had a meeting with Susan Marshall, Vice-President of Press for Change, on 13 July. Consideration will be given to further meetings as appropriate.

M4 Bus Lane

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 325, on the M4 bus lane, when information on the number of motorists that have been (a) charged and (b) cautioned for using the new bus lane on the M4 will be made available. [91409]

Mr. Boateng: The statistics collected centrally do not contain the location of offences and, therefore, offences committed on particular roads cannot be identified.

I understand from the Metropolitan Police that they do not routinely keep statistics at this level of detail either, and have no plans to do so.

Trials

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the last five years for which figures are available, of those defendants who pleaded not guilty at (a) the Crown Court and (b) the magistrates court, how many were acquitted and how many convicted. [91396]

Mr. Boateng: The table shows, in respect of cases handled by the Crown Prosecution Service, the outcome of contested hearings following a plea of not guilty in the Crown Court and in magistrates courts for each of the last five years. The table also shows the number of defendants convicted and acquitted, and expresses these as a proportion of all contested hearings.

Crown Court—contested hearings

Year ending March	Convictions after trial	Acquittals
1995	11,511	8,462
1996	12,358	8,399
1997	11,982	8,012
1998	13,413	9,012
1999	11,561	8,668

Magistrates courts—contested hearings

Year ending March	Convictions after trial	Dismissals
1995	72,307	20,997
1996	61,417	18,637
1997	53,393	17,769
1998	53,702	18,407
1999	47,889	17,181

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he has commissioned into the respective (a) rates of conviction, (b) levels of sentencing upon conviction following a plea of not guilty between (i) stipendiary and (ii) lay magistrates and (c) the levels of sentencing upon conviction following a plea of not guilty of (i) judges in the Crown Court, (ii) stipendiary and (iii) lay magistrates; and if he will publish it. [91397]

Mr. Boateng: Research is being commissioned jointly by the Home Office and the Lord Chancellor's Department to assess the relative costs, effectiveness and other benefits/disadvantages of stipendiary and lay magistrates. This will look, inter alia, at conviction rates and sentencing patterns, although it is unlikely that it will seek to distinguish between sentencing in contested and guilty plea cases. Some information about differences between sentencing by lay and stipendiary magistrates is to be found in "Sentencing Practice: an examination of decisions in magistrates courts and the Crown Court in the mid-1990's" by Flood-Page and Mackie (1998, Home Office Research Study No. 180), a copy of which is in the Library.

Statistical data are available on the type of sentence, including length of custody, received by defendants in the Crown Court for various offence groups by type of plea. These are to be found in Table 7E of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales 1997" (Home Office, 1998) a copy of which is in the Library. Data by plea are not yet available from magistrates courts.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the last five years for which figures are available, how many defendants have elected trial by (a) jury and (b) magistrates; and what proportion of defendants charged with either way offences (a) and (b) represent. [91395]

Mr. Boateng: The table shows, in respect of proceedings handled by the Crown Prosecution Service, the number of defendants charged with either way offences who elected trial by jury. These figures are also expressed as a percentage of all either way cases dealt with at the Crown Court.

The table also shows the number of defendants charged with either way offences who consented to summary trial, and whose case proceeded to a contested hearing in magistrates courts. However, the Crown Prosecution Service maintains no separate record of either way proceedings dealt with in magistrates' courts by way of a guilty plea.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in respect of offences triable either way, what was, for the last five years for which figures are available, the average period between the plea of not guilty and the trial in (a) the Crown Court and (b) the magistrates courts [91398]

Mr. Vaz: I have been asked to reply.

Information on the time taken to deal with proceedings in the Crown Court and the magistrates court is not collected in a way which allows offences triable either way to be separately identified.

The Court Service collects data on the average time between committal and arraignment or start of trial in the Crown Court. Table A shows the average time in the Crown Court from committal to start of trial for defendants pleading not guilty from 1994 to 1998. These data include both either way and indictable only cases.

The Lord Chancellor's Department Time Intervals Survey collects data on the duration of criminal cases completed in magistrates courts in sample weeks in February, June and October. The interval between a plea of not guilty and the trial is not separately identified. Table B gives the average number of days from first appearance or mode of trial decision to verdict for defendants pleading not guilty in indictable and triable either way cases in magistrates courts from 1994 to 1998.

Table A: Crown Court: England and Wales: Average time from committal to start of trial for defendants pleading not guilty, 1994 to 1998

Year	Average number of weeks from committal to start of trial
1994	21.4
1995	21.3
1996	19.1
1997	18.2
1998	18.4

1994	68
1995	73
1996	73
1997	73

Notes:
1. The date of first appearance is recorded for defendants in indictable only cases, whereas the date on mode of trial decision is recorded for defendants in triable either way cases.
2. The date of verdict includes finding of guilt, information dismissed and committed for trial, among other decisions.
3. Cases where offence to charge was over 10 years, or where charge to first listing or first listing to completion was over 1 year, are excluded from the analysis.

Human Rights Act 1998

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Human Rights Act 1998 comes into effect in (a) Wales and (b) Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [91687]

Mr. Straw: We plan to bring the remaining provisions of the Human Rights Act 1998 into force throughout the United Kingdom on 2 October 2000. However, under devolution legislation already in force, the Scottish Parliament and Executive of the Welsh Assembly may not lawfully act in a manner incompatible with convention rights.

Holocaust Remembrance Day

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress on the proposed consultation on plans for Holocaust Remembrance Day. [91692]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 16 July 1999]: Home Office officials have been working with colleagues from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for Education and Employment; and representatives of the British Board of Deputies and the Holocaust Trust, among others, to develop a proposal for a Holocaust Remembrance Day. This proposal will be the subject of wide consultation shortly.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90670]

Mr. Straw: Since 1 May 1997, two non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs), sponsored by my Department, have been disbanded—the Advisory Committee on Service Candidates (disbanded on 31 July 1998) and the Crime Prevention Agency Board (disbanded on 12 January 1999). During the next 12 months, I expect that the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and the Metropolitan Police Committee will be disbanded.

No Home Office NDPB has had its functions transferred either to another NDPB or a democratically elected body, and none has continued to perform a similar function under a different name.

Details of all NDPBs in existence on 1 May 1997, sponsored by my Department, are listed in "Public Bodies 1997". Since that date, we have established as NDPBs the Police Information Technology Organisation, the Race Relations Forum, the Youth Justice Board for England and Wales, the Office of the Surveillance Commissioners and the Sentencing Advisory Panel.

Although the Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and to ensuring that those which remain are open, accountable and effective, some of the new NDPBs established since 1 May are essential in helping the Government deliver their Manifesto commitments.

My Department is currently responsible for 36 NDPBs, plus 134 Boards of Visitors to Penal Establishments.

Firearms Compensation

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many claims for compensation under the Firearms (Amendment) (No. 2) Act 1997 Compensation Scheme (a) have been paid and (b) remain outstanding; [91852]

(2) what is his latest estimate of the value of claims under the Firearms (Amendment) (No. 2) Act 1997 Compensation Scheme (a) already paid and (b) still outstanding. [91853]

Mr. Boateng: 11,813 claims have been paid under the Compensation Scheme for small-calibre pistols at a cost of £6,144,557.22. A total of 334 claims remain outstanding under the small-calibre scheme. Given the payments made so far, the estimated value of the remaining claims is in the region of £174,000.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals his Working Party on Electoral Procedures has made in relation to access by political parties to the full Electoral Register. [91857]

Mr. George Howarth: In its summary of recommendations, a copy of which is in the Library, the Working Party have proposed that the full register should continue to be available to electoral users as at present. This would include the names of those persons who choose to be excluded from the register that is made commercially available.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received from business and charitable organisations to his consultation on the commercial sale of the Electoral Register. [91856]

Mr. George Howarth: As at 15 July, we had received a total of 99 individual written responses from 87 organisations working in the business and charitable sectors.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has placed on the Internet the responses to his consultation on the commercial sale of the Electoral Register, and publicised their existence, in accordance with the Cabinet Office guide on written consultation exercises. [91855]

Mr. George Howarth: The press release on 3 August 1998 which publicised the consultation was placed on the Internet. The summary of recommendations of the Working Party on Electoral Procedures, which includes recommendations about sale of the register, is being published on the Internet. The Working Party's final report will also appear there in due course. The Cabinet Office guide does not require the publication of responses to consultation exercises.

UK Passport Agency

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the relocation of the London Passport Office and Passport Agency headquarters. [91812]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The United Kingdom Passport Agency has been looking at options to relocate its Headquarters and the London Passport Office to improved accommodation elsewhere in London. A property has been identified—Bridge Place, 89 Eccleston square, Victoria which is currently on the Government Estate. Under the Passport Agency's Framework Document, it is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to approve any changes in office locations, and the Agency will be discussing whether he will approve the proposals shortly.

Health Care (Prisons)

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Prison Service will publish its proposed prison service instruction on complementary and alternative medicine. [91809]

Mr. George Howarth: A Prison Service Instruction is expected to be issued to prison establishments within the next three months, after consideration by senior Prison Service managers.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the composition and aims of the joint Prison Service/NHS health care policy and executive units. [91804]

Mr. George Howarth: The aims, objectives and composition of the new joint Prison Service/NHS Executive Prison Health Policy Unit and the Prison Health Care Taskforce are set out in framework documents. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to restrict the alternative and complementary medical treatments currently available in prisons and young offenders institutions; and if he will make a statement; [91807]

(2) which (a) prisons and (b) young offender institutions currently employ complementary and alternative medical practitioners; and what plans he has to change the arrangements for offering such services in prisons; [91806]

(3) what plans he has to reduce the current treatment modalities available through complementary medical services to prisoners at Her Majesty's Prisons Coldingley and Downview and Young Offenders Institution Feltham; and if he will make a statement. [91803]

Mr. George Howarth: The Government have accepted the recommendations of the joint Prison Service and NHS Executive Working Group on the future of prison health care, in particular that health care provision should be jointly planned and organised with the NHS according to formal health needs assessments. This means that complementary or alternative treatments, as is the case of other treatments, will only be made available on the recommendation of a prison doctor after he or she has taken account of an individual prisoner's health needs, and the demands upon available resources for other health services. Complementary and alternative treatments will not be given priority.

In keeping with the Prison Service's duty of care, and the need to ensure that treatments being made available are safe, effective, appropriate to the custodial context and conducive to the orderly running of prisons, treatments other than acupuncture, osteopathy, chiropractic, yoga and meditation will only be made available in circumstances where a good case can be shown, following the approval of the Prison Service's director of health care.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many sole practitioners currently provide complementary and alternative medical treatments in Her Majesty's Prisons and Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institutions. [91811]

Mr. George Howarth: The information is not available in the form requested. A survey of prison establishments completed in December 1998 showed that complementary and alternative treatments were provided by individual members of prison staff or sole practitioners from the public or private sectors at 44 Prison Service establishments.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the service providers currently offering complementary and alternative medical treatments in Her Majesty's Prisons and Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institutions. [91802]

Mr. George Howarth: Complementary and alternative medical treatments are currently known to be provided by: Complementary Medical Services for Prisoners (CMSP) at Coldingley and Downview prisons and at Feltham Young Offender Institution; by drugs project teams at Blakenhurst, Dartmoor, Gloucester, Leyhill and Standford Hill prisons; by individual practitioners at Buckley Hall, Dorchester, Durham, High Down and Holme House prisons; and by members of staff, including health-care staff, at Bedford, Blundeston, Brixton, Brockhill, Buckley Hall, Cookham Wood, Dartmoor, Dorchester, Dover, Erlestoke, Featherstone, Gartree, Gloucester, Hewell Grange, High Down, Highpoint, Hollesley Bay, Lancaster Castle, Leeds, Portland, Styal, Sudbury, Swansea and Weare prisons.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the complementary and alternative medical therapies offered in Her Majesty's Prisons and Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institutions, indicating the establishments in which they are offered. [91810]

Mr. George Howarth: The table shows the results of a survey carried out in December 1998 that indicated which establishments then provided each of the major complementary and alternative therapies.

Mr. George Howarth: No applications to establish such units have been received by the Prison Service directorate of health care.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications were received from (a) Serbia and (b) Colombia in 1998; and how many of the applications (i) were agreed, (ii) were refused and (iii) await decision; and if he will make a statement. [88835]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [pursuant to his reply, 30 June 1998, c.192]: The table referred to asylum applications for nationals of Colombia for 1997, and not 1998 as requested. The figures for Columbia for 1998 are given in the table.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Oncologists

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the number of clinical and medical oncologists per 100,000 population for each health authority in Northern Ireland. [90807]

Mr. McFall: In the Northern Ireland Health and Personal Social Services, all clinical and medical oncologists are based within the Eastern Health and Social Services Board area, however they provide a regional service for the whole of Northern Ireland. At 30 September 1998, the relevant staff figures for Northern Ireland were 0.87 clinical oncology staff and 0.25 medical oncology staff per 100,000 of the population.

Stroke Units

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the existing stroke units in Northern Health Board general hospitals which treat clients (a) in the acute phase, (b) in the rehabilitation phase and (c) in both; and in each case, what age criteria apply to admissions to the units. [90997]

Mr. McFall: Stroke patients in the acute phase are admitted to the stroke unit at Braid Valley, the Medical Admission Unit at Antrim Hospital, or the Acute Medical Wards in Coleraine, Whiteabbey and Mid-Ulster Hospitals.

Patients in the rehabilitation phase receive care in the Stroke Unit at Braid Valley Hospital, or the assessment and Rehabilitation wards at Coleraine, Whiteabbey and Mid-Ulster Hospitals.

There is no age criterion in any of the units providing treatment for stroke patients.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which general hospitals within the Northern Health Board have specialised stroke units; what plans there are to establish units where none presently exist; and what are the target dates for such plans. [91082]

Mr. McFall: There is one specialised stroke unit within the Northern Health and Social Services Board area, located at Braid Valley Hospital in Ballymena. Antrim Hospital has six designated stroke beds. There are no dedicated stroke units at Whiteabbey, Mid-Ulster or Coleraine Hospitals.

It is anticipated that a fully specialised stroke unit will be developed at the new Causeway Hospital when it opens in November 2000.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which of the health boards have a written policy on the management and rehabilitation of strokes. [90998]

Mr. McFall: All four Health and Social Services Boards have written policies on stroke services.

Fair Employment

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the latest figures from the Fair Employment Commission on the Post Office in Northern Ireland (a) in total and (b) in the head office in Tombe Street, Belfast, giving the numbers currently employed who are (i) Protestants, (ii) Roman Catholics and (iii) not defined. [90999]

Mr. Ingram: The Post Office in Northern Ireland is registered with the Fair Employment Commission as part of Royal Mail Scotland and Northern Ireland.

The monitoring information for Royal Mail Scotland and Northern Ireland includes employees working in Northern Ireland in the Royal Mail, Post Office Counters Ltd., Parcelforce Worldwide, Subscription Services Ltd. and Group Centre. Annual monitoring returns do not include data for individual locations.

The composition of the Northern Ireland work force of Royal Mail Scotland and Northern Ireland in January 1998 was:

Protestant—2,091 (53.3 per cent.)

Roman Catholics—1,834 (46.7 per cent.)

Non-determined—163.

Cockles

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps she is taking to prevent the destruction of the Zostera beds of Strangford Lough by mechanised cockle harvesting; and if she will make a statement. [91255]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Environment and Heritage Service under its acting Chief Executive, Mr. J. R. Lamont. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. S. Faulkner to Mr. Lembit Öpik, dated 15 July 1999:

As Acting Chief Executive of the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS), I am responsible for operational aspects of the conservation of statutory nature conservation sites in Northern Ireland. Although question No 873 involves the exploitation of a fishery for commercial purposes, your concern relates primarily to nature conservation and I have therefore been asked to reply on behalf of EHS and the Fisheries Division of the Department of Agriculture.

A Court case in 1997 between the National Trust and a shellfish collector operating in Strangford Lough resulted in a judgment that this activity was a common law right and as such was not subject to control through the Trust's byelaws. Those engaged in shellfish collecting are currently seeking to have large areas at the north end of the Lough classified for the purpose of harvesting wild shellfish. This decision rests with the Eastern Group Environmental Health Committee as it relates solely to public health. At least one area has recently been classified and it is understood that harvesting of cockles with the aid of a tractor-mounted dredger will commence shortly.

EHS has recently commissioned a literature review to determine the likely effects of mechanised cockle harvesting within Strangford Lough. This has revealed that the impact of tractor dredging on intertidal flora and fauna may depend on a number of factors, such as the time of year and the nature of the sediments. It is clear, however, that it can potentially be extremely damaging to beds of Zostera which are an important source of food for overwintering waterfowl within Strangford Lough.

Despite the designation of the intertidal area of the Lough as an Area of Special Scientific Interest (ASSI) and Special Protection Area (SPA), EHS cannot currently prevent the mechanical harvesting of shellfish from taking place. This is because those engaged in shellfish collecting are not lawful owners or occupiers of the foreshore but are operating under a common law right. EHS could introduce byelaws under the Habitats Regulations but this would be a lengthy process involving public consultation and would almost certainly be challenged by those intent on collecting shellfish.

The Department of Agriculture also has no powers at present to regulate the gathering of shellfish from the intertidal zone in Strangford Lough. In view of recent developments, however, the Department is proposing to introduce new primary legislation as quickly as possible to enable it to regulate fisheries in the intertidal zone around the entire Northern Ireland coastline.

I trust that you will appreciate from the above that the two Departments are aware of the potential seriousness of unregulated shellfish harvesting in Strangford Lough. Neither Department, however, may be able to prevent it taking place in the short term.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if she will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90793]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The information requested is as follows:

(a) NDPBs disbanded since 1 March 1997:

1. NI Citizen's Charter Advisory panel on 2 May 1997
2. Ulster Folk & Transport Museum on 31 March 1998
3. Ulster Museum on 31 March 1998
4. North Down & Ards Community HSS Trust on 31 March 1998
5. Ulster, North Down & Ards Hospital HSS Trust on 31 March 1998
6. Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights on 28 February 1999

(b) NDPBs which will be disbanded in the next 12 months:

HEALTH

Hospital Sports Sites

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital sports sites have been granted planning permission since 1 May 1997. [88495]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Dental Services

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions he has had with the General Dental Council regarding their jurisdiction in assessing whether a dentist meets minimum standards of practice; [90414]

(2) what plans he has to review the statutory responsibilities of the General Dental Council in respect of the professional conduct of dentists. [90415]

Mr. Denham: The General Dental Council has proposed that it is empowered to test and identify dentists who demonstrate a consistently poor standard of performance (but are not suspected of serious professional misconduct). We have welcomed these proposals and intend to use Section 60 of the Health Act 1999 to make the necessary amendments to the Dentists Act 1984.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has made to the General Dental Council in respect of the adequacy of its procedures for dealing with serious professional misconduct. [90842]

Mr. Denham: We have full confidence in the General Dental Council's handling of serious professional misconduct cases, but it has let us know that hearing these cases is making heavy demands of the six lay members on the Council. Accordingly we will shortly be acting on the Council's proposal that its lay membership be increased to 12.

NHS Site Sales

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the sites owned by the National Health Service which the NHS Executive is seeking planning permission for housing developments and the current status of each application. [90742]

Mr. Denham: A list of sites owned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for which planning permission for housing development is being sought is given in the table. The list includes the current status of each application.

This list does not include sites owned by National Health Service trusts, since they would themselves be seeking planning permission, not the NHS Executive. Information relating to NHS trusts could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pen Needles

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the availability on the NHS of pen needles for children with diabetes. [90811]

Mr. Denham: We have consulted on proposals which would allow insulin pen needles to be prescribed by general practitioners on the National Health Service for both adults and children. We have received representations from most of the organisations consulted. We are considering them, and are seeking clarification on certain points before we make our final decisions.

Oncologists

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each OECD country the number of clinical and medical oncologists per 100,000 population; and if he will make a statement. [90804]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of clinical and medical oncologists per 100,000 population for each health authority in England. [90803]

Pensioners (Free Treatment)

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost of extending free optical and dental treatment to all state pensioners. [90698]

Mr. Denham: From 1 April everyone aged 60 and over has been eligible for free National Health Service sight tests. If this group were also made eligible for spectacle vouchers, regardless of income, the additional cost would be about £100 million per annum. Hospital optical treatment is provided free of charge to all NHS patients. The annual cost of extending free dental treatment to all state pensioners is estimated at a minimum of about £100 million assuming no increase in the volume of dental services provided to this age group.

Severalls Hospital, Colchester

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will name the company to which it is intended to sell the former Severalls Hospital at Colchester; at what price it is to be sold; and when he expects the sale to be completed. [90707]

Mr. Denham: No contracts for sale have yet been signed nor have solicitors been instructed to draw up a contract. Discussions for a potential sale are continuing with terms yet to be agreed. It would be prejudicial at this stage to name the parties with whom negotiations are being conducted or to disclose terms of a potential sale including expectations on price or value. Parts of Severall Hospital are, of course, occupied for National Health Service needs and will continue to be so for the foreseeable future.

If negotiations are successful, completion could be by early 2000.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90669]

Ms Jowell: Of the non-Departmental public bodies (NDPBs) in existence on 1 May 1997: (a) the Advisory Committee on Design Quality in the National Health Service was abolished on 20 July 1998, the Royal Commission on Long Term Care was abolished on 1 May 1999, and the Standing Committee on Postgraduate Medical Education was abolished on 1 April 1999; (b) The Advisory Committee on Genetic Testing, the Human Genetics Advisory Commission and the Clinical Standards Advisory Group will be disbanded in the next 12 months. The Central Council on Education and Training for Social Work (an executive NDPB) will be abolished by 31 March 2001; (c) None has had their functions transferred (i) to another non-departmental public body or (ii) to a democratically elected body; and (d) none has been re-named.

Since 1 May 1997 the following NDPBs have been established: the Royal Commission on Long Term Care of the Elderly (now abolished); and the Genetics and Insurance Committee. The Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens, which was a departmental committee, has been reclassified as an advisory NDPB. The Nurses', Midwives and other NHS Professions' Review Body, Doctors and Dentists Review Panel and the Pharmacists' Review Panel were inherited by the Department from the Office of Manpower and Economics during the period. The Department is responsible for 7 executive and 39 advisory NDPBs.

The status of the Advisory Committee on Breast Cancer Screening, the National Specialist Commissioning Advisory Group and the Microbiology Advisory Committee have been reclassified by the Cabinet Office and no longer have NDPB status: they are now regarded as Departmental bodies.

Radiation

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will evaluate the recent study on the effects of radiation from VDUs at the offices of Southampton and South West Hampshire Health Authority; and if he will make a statement. [91923]

Ms Jowell: This recent study claims to show that office staff who use visual display units (VDUs) experience various adverse health reactions which can be relieved by a device fitted to the VDU screen.

The Government obtain advice from the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) on risks to health from exposure to electromagnetic fields. NRPB's Advisory Group on Non-ionising Radiation evaluated in detail the health effects of working with VDUs and published a report in 1994 "Health Effects Related to the Use of Visual Display Units" (Documents of the NRPB Volume 5, No2—copies of which are available in the Library). The Advisory Group concluded that exposure to radiation resulting from the use of VDUs causes no significant health effects. In responding to this recent study NRPB have commented that since the publication of their 1994 report, no research published in peer reviewed journals has led to a change to this conclusion.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in its assessment of radiation, the National Radiological Protection Board takes account of non-thermal effects; and if he will make a statement. [91919]

Ms Jowell: I have been advised by the National Radiological Protection Board that there is a consensus among national and international expert bodies that standards for protection of people from electromagnetic fields (EMF) should be based upon sound scientific evidence of established effects on human health. This is also the view of NRPB. For low frequencies, standards are set to prevent effects on the central nervous system and to avoid shocks. For higher frequencies they are set to prevent damage due to heating of body tissues. Concerns about other, so-called athermal effects arising from exposure to EMFs have also been raised. These include suggestions of subtle effects on cells that could affect cancer development or of influences on electrically excitable tissue that could influence the function of the brain and nervous tissue.

While mindful, therefore, that some scientific data challenge the conventional assumptions upon which protection standards are based, NRPB has concluded that biological interactions resulting from such effects are neither well defined nor understood. Additionally, there is no convincing biological evidence that electromagnetic fields could cause cancer or other athermal effects. The basis for its recommendations is therefore established biological effects.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports he has received of research by the USA National Institute of Environmental Health Systems into the effect of extremely low-frequency radiation; and if he will make a statement. [91921]

Ms Jowell: The Department has been advised that the National Radiological Protection Board is aware of a report published by the US National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences (NIEHS) on 15 June 1999. The Report to Congress on the US EMF (Electromagnetic Field) Research and Public Information Dissemination Programme indicates that

> "the NIEHS believes that the probability that EMF is truly a health hazard is currently small. The weak epidemiological associations and lack of laboratory support for these associations provide only marginal scientific support that exposure to this agent causes any degree of harm".

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to conduct research into the emissions from mobile phones and VDUs of extremely low-frequency radiation; and if he will make a statement. [91922]

Ms Jowell: Research into potential effects of microwaves, such as those emitted by mobile phones, is being undertaken on a worldwide basis. The Department is contributing to these international initiatives and is also supporting its own research. A programme of research and exposure assessment is being carried out at the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB). The NRPB has recently been asked to set up a working group to assess the current state of research into the use of mobile phones. The Chairman, Sir William Stewart has been appointed and the membership and terms of references will be announced shortly.

The NRPB also keeps the safety of Visual Display Units under review. It has concluded that exposure to radiation resulting from the use of VDUs causes no significant adverse health effects.

Complementary Medicine

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what part the provision of complementary and alternative medicines plays in the drug strategy for the South London area. [91805]

Ms Jowell: It is for health and local authorities to decide the type and level of drug treatment services that are provided and commissioned in their areas. This includes use of alternative and complementary therapies.

DEFENCE

Smart Procurement

10. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the performance of the smart procurement initiative in improving value for money in procurement. [90208]

Mr. George Robertson: I am confident that the Smart Procurement Initiative will produce improved value for money through faster, cheaper and better acquisition of defence capability. We are on track to achieve the savings of £2 billion to which we are committed, and early indications are that substantial further savings are in prospect.

Unaccompanied Tours

11. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of personnel in the (a) infantry, (b) Royal Armoured Corps and (c) Royal Engineers are currently engaged in, or working up for, unaccompanied tours. [90209]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Twenty eight per cent. of the Infantry, 47 per cent. of the RAC and 67 per cent. of the Royal Engineers are currently engaged in, or working up for, unaccompanied tours. In view of the current level of commitment of the Royal Engineers, I have decided that our plans to create a fifth engineer logistic squadron following the Strategic Defence Review, should be brought forward two years from 2002 to 2000. This enhancement to the Royal Engineers will be achieved by establishing a second Queen's Gurkha Engineer Squadron to be based at Invicta Barracks, Maidstone. The nucleus of the new squadron will be formed immediately and the squadron will be available for operational tasking towards the end of next year.

Territorial Army

12. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the structure of the Territorial Army. [R] [90210]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The assumptions underpinning the reform of the Territorial Army, announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of state for Defence to the House on 17 November 1998, Official Report, columns 749–71 remain valid. There are therefore no plans at present to revisit this reform, nor to initiate a further review of the structure of the TA.

Child Support Agency

16. Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps his Department takes to encourage serving personnel to meet their family responsibilities as required by the CSA. [90215]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Financial support by Service personnel for their dependants is essentially a private matter for the individuals. However, Service personnel are subject to child support legislation and where an individual fails, or refuses, to fulfil this requirement, my Department will make deductions from pay to meet child maintenance assessments when requested to do so by the Child Support Agency.

Kosovo

17. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what records are to be kept on the Kosovo military campaign; and where they are to be located. [90216]

Mr. George Robertson: Records of every aspect of the campaign are kept. They will be drawn upon in work undertaken as lessons to be learned and subsequently archived in accordance with the Public Records Acts 1958 and 1967.

18. Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Kosovo. [90217]

24. Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Kosovo. [90223]

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the security situation in Kosovo. [90213]

Mr. George Robertson: The Security situation in Kosovo continues to improve as KFOR becomes larger and increasingly well established. While incidents such as looting and murder are still occurring, Serb and KLA compliance with their respective undertakings has been satisfactory so far. Around 700,000 refugees have returned and are vigorously rebuilding their lives. This is due in no small part to the efforts of KFOR troops who continue to do an excellent job.

Improvements in the security situation, and the continuing arrival in theatre of troops from other nations, make it possible for me to announce some further withdrawals of British troops from Kosovo. Between August and October, we will be bringing home the 1 PARA, 1 Royal Gurkha Rifles, and the Irish Guards battle groups together with their supporting elements.

These withdrawals, together with the withdrawals of units of the Royal Air Force and Royal Navy announced last month, will go a long way to help relieve the overstretch in the Armed Forces. Further withdrawals, including that of HQ Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps, will follow.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contribution he and his Department are making to (a) the United States and (b) NATO post-Kosovo reviews. [91576]

Mr. George Robertson: The Ministry of Defence is looking at the lessons learned from the Kosovo conflict, and is contributing to similar work at NATO. I and my Department will continue to have contacts with Allies, including the US, on a wide range of issues, including lessons learned.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many troops Russia has committed to Operation Joint Guardian; how many Russian troops have been deployed; what is the deadline for the deployment of Russian troops to Kosovo; and if he will make a statement. [91571]

Mr. George Robertson: The total number of Russian forces committed to Operation Joint Guardian will not exceed 3,600. Five battalions (approximately 2,850 troops) will be deployed in the three sectors, and up to 750 troops for airfield and logistics base operations. There will also be 16 liaison officers.

There is no NATO deadline for the deployment of Russian troops to Kosovo. As of 15 July 1999, 713 members of the Russian armed forces were deployed in Kosovo.

NATO allies welcome the Russian contribution to Operation Joint Guardian. NATO and Russia have worked together successfully in Bosnia and look forward to doing the same in Kosovo.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel and at what grade or rank are currently reviewing the Strategic Defence Review following the Kosovo conflict. [91575]

Mr. George Robertson: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave on 10 May 1999, Official Report, column 8, to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman).

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if all Serbian paramilitary forces have left Kosovo; [91591]

(2) how many members of (a) the Yugoslav army, (b) the SAJ anti-terrorist police and (c) the PJP combat police forces he estimates have left Kosovo. [91572]

Mr. George Robertson: COMKFOR declared on 20 June 1999 that all Serbian military and paramilitary forces had left Kosovo.

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the proportion of Serb armour in Kosovo which survived the bombing campaign. [90211]

Mr. George Robertson: Now that K-FOR troops are deployed in Kosovo, a full assessment of the damage inflicted on Yugoslav forces, and the proportion of Serb armour in Kosovo that survived the campaign, is underway. This will take some time to complete.

Eurofighter

19. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the delay in the entry into operational RAF squadron service of the Eurofighter 2000 Typhoon aircraft as against its first publicly announced projected in-service dates [90218]

Mr. George Robertson: Since the start of the Eurofighter development programme in 1988, there has been slippage of 42 months against the original estimated entry into service date, defined as delivery of the first aircraft to the Royal Air Force. The current date is June 2002.

Army Units (Personnel)

21. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which (a) Regular and (b) Territorial Army units are not at full strength. [90220]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Approximately 75 per cent. of Regular Army Arms and Services are currently under strength to varying degrees against their trained requirement. The Territorial Army, on the other hand, is generally over strength as the full impact of the Strategic Defence Review drawdown has not yet taken effect. I will place full details of each in the Library of the House.

Gurkhas

22. Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review conditions of service for Gurkhas in the armed services. [90221]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As I announced to the House on 1 July 1999, Official Report, column 471, I have set up a group to examine Gurkha pensions and gratuities. I will chair the group which will take into account all aspects of Gurkha pensions and gratuities within the context of the Tri-Partite Agreement between Nepal, India and the UK. I expect the work to be completed by the end of the year.

War Crimes (Former Yugoslavia)

23. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assistance has been provided by British troops to those responsible for arresting people indicted for war crimes in the former Yugoslavia. [90222]

Mr. George Robertson: In Bosnia, SFOR has detained 14 persons indicted by the ICTY. Nine of these detentions have taken place in the British-commanded sector and involved British forces, either directly or in support. Most recently, Radislav Brdjanin was detained by British SFOR forces on 6 July.

In Kosovo, British troops have helped to secure sites which may contain evidence of crimes, and British military personnel have assisted in obtaining witness statements and in supporting the ICTY's forensic investigations.

National Audit Office Report

26. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the report of the National Audit Office on the cost of overruns and delays in his Department's projects. [90225]

Mr. Spellar: It is open to the Committee of Public Accounts to decide to take evidence on the Comptroller and Auditor General's Report on the Major Projects Report 1998 (HC 519 Sessions 1998–99). In accordance with the usual convention on committee business I cannot offer any comment which might pre-empt the Committee's consideration. However, the Comptroller and Auditor General's Report makes clear that the cost overruns and time delays in question have accumulated over a number of years and acknowledges that the Smart Procurement initiative has been launched to tackle these problems.

Armed Forces (Reductions)

27. Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his policy to retain the immediate post-cold war reductions in the armed forces. [90226]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The complete force structure inherited from the previous Government was examined in the Strategic Defence Review. Increases against previous plans were agreed in a number of areas, notably the overall size of the Army to make the armed forces more flexible, usable and deployable. The Strategic Defence Review force structure is now being implemented.

Defence Manufacturing (North-west)

28. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to visit BAe Samlesbury-Warton to discuss defence manufacturing capacity in the north-west. [90227]

Mr. Spellar: The importance of BAe Samlesbury and Warton to defence manufacturing in the north west is well appreciated by this Department. However, there are no immediate plans for Defence Ministers to visit BAe Samlesbury/Warton.

Child Labour Convention

29. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect of applying the ILO convention on child labour to the British armed forces. [90228]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The new ILO Convention concerns the prohibition and immediate action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. This includes the

> "forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict" which is clearly an unacceptable form of child labour. The recruitment of genuine volunteers, as undertaken here in the UK, is entirely different from the abusive, exploitative, forced or coercive involvement of children in armed conflict as members of militia or para-military forces. The new Convention will not, therefore, have an effect on our armed forces.

Depleted Uranium

30. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the Army does not hold depleted uranium munitions. [90229]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Army does hold stocks of depleted uranium based ammunition.

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals (a) in or formerly with the armed forces and (b) in Southern Iraq have been tested specifically for evidence of depleted uranium contamination. [90363]

Mr. Doug Henderson: There is no central record of any health tests conducted for those still serving or for those who have left the armed forces.

The Ministry of Defence is aware of the suggestion that exposure to depleted uranium (DU) is a cause of ill-health among some veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict. Any Gulf veteran who is concerned that their health has been adversely affected by service during that conflict is entitled to seek a referral to the Ministry of Defence's Gulf Veterans' Medical Assessment Programme (MAP) for a full medical assessment. During assessment, the patient receives a set of standard tests. If the examining physician considers it clinically appropriate for a patient to receive tests to detect DU, these would be arranged. Between one and five people so far examined by MAP physicians, have exhibited symptoms that, in the judgment of the examining physicians, have indicated a clinical requirement for testing to detect DU, and have been tested.

However, a very small number of UK troops, who expressed concern that they might have inhaled DU dust during preparatory training in Saudi Arabia before the state of hostilities, were subjected to Whole Body Monitoring in February 1991. They showed no detectable contamination.

The Ministry of Defence is also aware of reports of DU testing undertaken by Professor Sharma of the University of Waterloo, Ontario, and Dr. Durakovic of Georgetown University, Washington. Dr. Durakovic discussed their work in general terms with Ministry of Defence officials in February 1999, when he explained that they are carrying out a study into uranium levels among veterans of the Gulf conflict, in which it is understood a small number of UK Gulf veterans and Iraqi nationals are participating. Dr. Durakovic indicated that they plan to publish their findings, including details of the methodology they are using and the results obtained, later this year. Their work is not being undertaken at the request of the Ministry of Defence and any UK Gulf veterans who choose to participate do so on a voluntary basis.

The healthcare of Iraqi nationals, including any testing for the presence of DU, is a matter for the Iraqi Government.

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 June 1999, Official Report, column 148, on Kosovo, what measures have been taken to identify targets hit by depleted uranium ammunition; and whether non-standard issue NBC kit has been issued for troops in proximity to such locations. [90950]

Mr. George Robertson: Although British Forces did not fire depleted uranium ammunition in Kosovo, we await information through NATO channels as to whether any such ammunition was used in the British led sector.

Service personnel deployed in Kosovo have been given appropriate guidance, and provided with standard NBC equipment, including protective gloves and respiratory equipment, which they should wear if contact with targets damaged by DU ammunition is unavoidable.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what investigations he is undertaking into the environmental impact of the use of weapons containing depleted uranium during the conflict in Kosovo and Serbia; [91764]

(2) what decontamination work is taking place in Kosovo as a result of the use by US forces of weapons containing depleted uranium; what responsibility the US is taking for the cost of this work, and if (i) UK and (ii) other EU personnel are involved. [91765]

Mr. George Robertson: No decontamination work is currently taking place in Kosovo. A joint task force has been set up by the UN Environment Programme and the UN Commission on Settlements to assess the environmental and health aspects of the conflict. The UK stands ready to co-operate with that task force.

Aircraft Carriers

31. Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in his Department's plans to procure two new aircraft carriers. [90230]

Mr. George Robertson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire), Official Report, column 778.

Officer Recruitment

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current state of officer recruiting and retention. [90219]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Officer recruitment to the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force is encouraging. Officer recruitment to the Royal Navy was 3 per cent.

higher in the year 1998–99 than in the previous year, and was 8 per cent. higher for the RAF. Officer recruitment to the Army, however, fell 23 per cent. during the same period, and addressing this is an important priority. As part of this work, we have introduced enhanced bursary and sponsorship schemes to increase the attraction of an Army career to potential officers.

Procurement Projects

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the procurement projects in category C or above whose in-service dates have been postponed or notified to industry during 1999, indicating the (i) original and (ii) new in-service dates. [82897]

Mr. Spellar: The In-service dates, ISD, of equipment may be revised during procurement for a number of reasons: to reflect project changes; to reflect a more realistic assessment of delivery dates; or because of adjustments to our wider defence programme priorities. Contractors are notified of revised dates when there may be contractual implications.

Since the start of this year, the forecast ISDs for those projects that have passed the initial concept phase and which have been postponed are as follows:

Project	ISD as at 31 December 1998	1999 ISD
Sonar 2193 for Hunt Class	October 2001	October 2003
Survey Vessel 1	July 2001	July 2002
Alternative Landing Ship Logistic 1	September 2002	February 2004
Stingray Life Extension	May 2004	May 2005
Royal Navy Joint Tactical Information Distribution System—ship fit	December 2001	December 2002
Sonar 2087	August 2004	December 2004
Radar Type 996 Availability Improvements	January 2002	May 2002
Radar Type 996 Track Extractor	September 2001	January 2002
All Terrain Vehicle (Protected)	December 2002	June 2003
Medium Range Third Generation Anti-Tank Guided Weapon	August 2003	June 2005
Heavy Equipment Transporter	December 2002	May 2003
Joint Tactical Information Distribution System for third Tornado Squadron	December 1998	December 1999
Nimrod MRA4	April 2003	March 2005

Two further projects have similarly been postponed, the Cooperative Outboard Logistic Update, with a delay of 12 months, and Project Botanical, with a delay of 37 months. Publication of the precise ISDs of these projects could give potential enemy an insight into a sensitive operational capability and I am, therefore, withholding this information under exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Anglo-Irish Meeting

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the meeting at the home of Commandant Patrick Trears in the Republic of Ireland on 30 July 1974 involving Major Peter Maynard. [87461]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 18 June 1999]: An informal meeting was held with a view to the possibility of exchanging technical information between Irish and British explosives experts which would have been of benefit to both sides. No action was taken as a result of the meeting.

Faslane Shiplift

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current status of the shiplift at Faslane; and if he will make a statement. [88132]

Mr. Spellar: The Clyde Naval Base shiplift is currently in use for the docking of a Vanguard class submarine.

DLH Project

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much further over budget the Active Decoy Round-Outfit DLH Project has gone since the 1997 National Audit Office Major Projects report. [90968]

Mr. Spellar: The estimated cost of the Outfit DLH project has not increased since the NAO's 1997 Major Project Report. The current estimated cost for the project, at 1999–2000 prices, is £108 million. This is consistent with the projects in the 1997 NAO Major Project Report uplifted to the same 1999–2000 price base.

US Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Heseltine: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of contracts awarded to British companies under the US Strategic Defence Initiative and their total value, in each year since 1985. [90760]

Mr. Spellar: The MOD does not maintain a central or comprehensive record of all contracts let by the US Government with UK industry and universities under the Strategic Defence Initiative.

2nd Division

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what additional annual staff costs will be incurred as a result of moving HQ command of the 2nd Division from York to Edinburgh. [91142]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The staff establishment of the new Headquarters 2nd Division in Edinburgh has yet to be finalised but annual staff costs are expected to be £650,000 lower than those of the existing Divisional Headquarters in York. Taking into account the other consequences of the amalgamation of the Scottish District and 2nd Division Headquarters, the resultant savings in staff costs are expected to be of the order of £3 million per annum.

Military Visits

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the occasions on which the GOC Northern Ireland has met military officers of foreign countries, (b) the occasions on which senior officers have attended social gatherings and receptions for foreign military delegations and (c) the cost of entertainments for overseas delegations and visitors since 1 May 1997. [89913]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 12 July 1999]: Records of the General Officer Commanding's (GOC's) meetings from 1 May 1997 to the end of March 1998 are not available. The GOC NI has met military officers of foreign countries on the following occasions since 1 April 1998:

1 April 1998

Dinner for visiting members of the Royal College of Defence Studies in Northern Ireland. Overall cost: £390.98

6 May 1998

Presentation to the Royal College of Defence Studies in England. Cost: £59.30.

18 June 1998

Presentation to the Joint Senior Command Staff College in England. Cost of refreshments (tea/coffee only) borne by individual students.

24 March 1999

Dinner for visiting members of the Royal College of Defence Studies in Northern Ireland. Cost: estimated at £360—invoice not yet received.

4 June 1999

Presentation to the Joint Senior Command Staff College in England. Cost of refreshments (tea/coffee only) borne by individual students.

Other British senior military officers also attended the dinners with the Royal College of Defence Studies.

Armed Forces Deployments

Mr. ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many armed forces personnel he estimates will be committed to (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Kosovo, (c) Bosnia, (d) the Gulf, (e) Germany, (f) Gibraltar, (g) Cyprus, (h) other Mediterranean and Near East, (i) the Far East and (j) other locations in each of the next two years; and if he will make a statement on the numbers for each location; [90936]

(2) how many armed forces personnel are currently committed to (a) Northern Ireland, (b) Kosovo, (c) Bosnia, (d) the Gulf, (e) Germany, (f) Gibraltar, (g) Cyprus, (h) other Mediterranean and Near East, (i) the Far East and (j) other locations. [90937]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The approximate numbers of Service personnel deployed on operations or garrisoned in these locations (as at 1 July 1999 unless otherwise stated) are as follows:

(a) Northern Ireland—16,500

(b) Kosovo—10,100 (including FYROM, Greece, Italy and RN personnel afloat)

(c) Bosnia—3,590 (plus a further 1,000 in Croatia)

(d) The Gulf—1,330 (as at 6 July 1999) (including personnel in Turkey to patrol the Northern No Fly Zone over Iraq)

(e) Germany—27,700

(f) Gibraltar—440

(g) Cyprus—3,700 (1 January 1999)

(h) Other Mediterranean and Near East—0

(i) The Far East—1,070

(j) Other locations—1,530

We keep these commitments under review and any adjustments made over the next two years will reflect changes to our operational and other requirements.

Project Aquatrine

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is (a) the purpose and (b) the cost of Project Aquatrine; how many of his Department's sites are involved; and if he will make a statement. [91570]

Mr. Spellar: The purpose of Project Aquatrine is to allow the MOD to substantially reduce its direct involvement in the provision of water and sewerage services, which, while important is not regarded as a core activity. The underlying principle driving Project Aquatrine is the maintenance of current and future services with improved value for money. It is considered that the most effective and efficient way to deliver and support these services across our sites throughout Great Britain would be to adopt an innovative situation based on a Public Private Partnership. This approach would enable us to access external capital and commercial expertise and better manage our continuing environmental responsibilities.

Royal Tournament

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future of the Royal Tournament. [92197]

Mr. George Robertson: Last year, I announced that the Royal Tournament in its current form would end on a high in 1999, but that a flagship Armed Forces event would continue in the future.

The Royal Military Tattoo 2000 will be a flagship contribution by the Armed Forces to the country's Millennium celebrations. Within the setting of Horse Guards' Parade, the theme will be Defence of the Realm: Past, Present and Future, portraying a 1000 year story. The event will take place between 10–15 July 2000, with one performance each evening.

From 2001 onwards, the spirit of the Royal Tournament will be carried forward in a showcase event in London. This will be a Military Tattoo at Horse Guards Parade, involving ceremonial, massed bands, and pageantry. It will be held in the summer inside a week.

In addition, a Military Festival will be held annually outside London at different military locations, also in the summer. In 2001 this will be at Portsmouth, based on the Royal Navy's Festival of the Sea.

These changes will mean that the final Royal Navy Field Gun Competition will take place at the 1999 Royal Tournament, in the centenary year of the action it commemorates.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90671]

Mr. Spellar: In line with Government policy, the Ministry of Defence is committed to keeping the number of Non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs) to a minimum and to ensuring that those which remain are open, accountable and effective. MOD had 17 NDPBs on 1 May 1997. None has been disbanded, and there are no current plans for any to be disbanded in the next 12 months. The Royal College of Defence Studies Advisory Board was declassified as an NDPB in October 1998, but not disbanded. The Nuclear Weapons Safety Committee and the Nuclear Powered Warship Safety Committee merged to form the Defence Nuclear Safety Committee in November 1998. No other body has had its functions transferred or has been renamed in this period. In August 1998, the Animal Welfare Advisory Committee (a body already in existence) was classified as an advisory NDPB. In addition to the above changes, MOD has taken over as lead department for the Armed Forces Pay Review Body which was formerly listed under HM Treasury.

MOD is currently responsible for 17 NDPBs: Fleet Air Arm Museum, Royal Naval Museum, Royal Marines Museum, Royal Navy Submarine Museum, National Army Museum, Royal Air Force Museum, Oil and Pipelines Agency, Advisory Committee on Conscientious Objectors, Animal Welfare Advisory Committee, Armed Forces Pay Review Body, Dartmoor Steering Group, Defence Nuclear Safety Committee, Defence Scientific Advisory Council, Independent Board of Visitors for the Military Corrective Training Centre, National Employer Liaison Committee, Review Board for Government Contracts, Royal Military College of Science Advisory Council.

Serbia

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reports he has received of environmental damage caused by the war in Serbia, with particular reference to radioactive material. [91588]

Mr. George Robertson: No solid evidence has so far been presented of damage to the environment as a result of NATO's air campaign. The environmental effects of the conflict in Kosovo are to be assessed by a joint task force set up by the UN Environment Programme and the UN Commission on Human Settlements. The UK stands ready to co-operate with that task force.

TRIGAT Programme

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence If he will make a statement on the medium-range TRIGAT programme. [90199]

Mr. George Robertson: I announced on 10 June that the UK intend to join the Industrialisation and Production phase of the Medium Range TRIGAT programme. The UK, France and Germany have now signed a Memorandum of Understanding covering that stage of the programme. Subject to signature of the Memorandum of Understanding by the remaining partner nations, Belgium and the Netherlands, and satisfactory final negotiations with the Prime Contractor, Aerospatiale, we expect to place a contract for the Industrialisation and Production phase of the weapon system later this year.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many meetings of the CJCC he has attended. [89273]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 5 July 1999, Official Report, column 362.

MOX Fuel Shipments

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those countries whose Governments have made representations to his Department about the imminent shipment of MOX fuel to Japan; and which of those Governments have also requested meetings. [91144]

Mr. Hoon: To date, representations have been made by the Governments of New Zealand and the Republic of Korea about the forthcoming shipment of MOX fuel to Japan. A meeting with the New Zealand High Commissioner took place on 28 June.

Though no specific representations have been made by Caribbean states on the MOX shipment, a meeting with Commonwealth Caribbean High Commissioners to discuss the more general issue of the movement of nuclear material through the Caribbean Sea will be held on 21 July.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidance has been issued to embassies overseas on issues related to the imminent shipment of MOX fuel to Japan; and if he will place copies in the Library. [91079]

Mr. Hoon: Detailed guidance on the forthcoming MOX shipment has been provided to posts. As it includes confidential material for the information of governments along the possible routes, it would not be appropriate to place copies of it in the Library.

Industry guidance has also been supplied to posts. Copies of this will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department has taken to reassure other Governments that the shipment of MOX fuel is neither an environmental nor a proliferation risk. [91154]

Mr. Hoon: Though under no obligation to do so, it has been our practice since 1996 to provide information in advance and on a confidential basis to coastal states, both on and off the route, on shipments of nuclear materials. This includes information on the internationally agreed physical protection measures in place to counter any environmental or proliferation risk. We intend to continue with this practice in the case of the forthcoming MOX shipment.

Sellafield MOX Plant

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the unclassified submissions made by his Department to the last two rounds of consultation on the proposed Sellafield MOX plant. [91078]

Mr. Hoon: No submissions were made by my Department to the last two rounds of consultation on the proposed Sellafield MOX plant.

Gibraltar

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he made to the European Commission about delays at the border between Spain and Gibraltar (a) before and (b) after it became apparent that the Commission's decision on whether to take action would be further delayed. [91244]

Ms Quin: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave on 14 July 1999, Official Report, column 256.

Libya

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government concerning United Nations sanctions against Libya; and if he will make a statement. [91239]

Mr. Hoon: We remain in close consultation with the Governments of the United States and Libya and the United Nations Secretary-General with a view to securing full Libyan compliance with the requirements of the relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions. We welcome the progress to date, as set out in the Secretary-General's report to the UN Security Council last week. When the remaining requirements are met, the United Kingdom will support the lifting of UN sanctions against Libya, which are currently suspended.

Indonesia

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations his Department has made to the Government of Indonesia concerning the referendum in East Timor. [91241]

Mr. Hoon: We are in regular contact with the Indonesian Government about the UN supervised consultation in East Timor scheduled for August. We have emphasised that the Indonesian Government must fulfil their commitments to ensure a security situation in which a satisfactory consultation can take place.

Kashmir

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from Amnesty International about the situation in Kashmir; and if he will make a statement. [91690]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 16 July 1999]: We have studied Amnesty International's report, published earlier this year, on disappearances in Kashmir. We share the concern expressed there over aspects of the human rights situation in Kashmir, while welcoming the steps the Indian Government have taken in recent years to improve human rights observance in India. We continue to condemn all human rights abuses, whether by militants or the security forces, and to encourage the Indian authorities to bring the perpetrators to justice.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the state of the conflict between India and Pakistan over Kashmir; and if he will make a statement. [91691]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 16 July 1999]: We welcome the disengagement of infiltrators from their positions on the Indian side of the Line of Control, and India's suspension of airstrikes against them. We trust that the conditions for a complete cessation of fighting will soon be created, and that both sides will work to assure the integrity of the Line of Control. We continue to urge India and Pakistan to resume their bilateral dialogue on all outstanding issues, including Kashmir, and hope for an early return to the process started at Lahore in February.

Mr. Michael Ashcroft

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will hold an inquiry into the leaking of his Department's documents relating to Michael Ashcroft to the Press. [91938]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: An inquiry into the circumstances of the leak of protectively marked information to the press was instituted early on 13 July.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any of his special advisers prior to 13 July passed on to or discussed with a journalist the contents of documents referring to Michael Ashcroft. [91937]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: An inquiry was instituted on 13 July into the circumstances of the leak. We need to await the result of that inquiry.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any of his special advisers at any time prior to 13 July had access to, or were informed of, the contents of documents referring to Michael Ashcroft. [91936]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: An inquiry was instituted on 13 July into the circumstances of the leak. We need to await the result of that inquiry. The rules applying to Ministers as regards access to papers of a previous Administration also apply to special advisers.

Disarmament Conferences

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards an agreed formula for negotiations in the current session of the Conference on Disarmament on a Fissile Material Treaty; and if Russia remains a participating country. [91730]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We regret that the Conference on Disarmament has been unable to agree a work programme which would enable negotiations to begin on the Fissile Material Cut Off Treaty. In May, together with France and the United States, we put forward proposals designed to break the deadlock in the Conference on Disarmament. We will continue to work for an early start to negotiations.

Russia remains a member of the Conference on Disarmament and will be expected to participate in negotiations when they begin.

UNHCR (Kosovo)

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether the UNHCR in Kosovo have the expertise to deal with the dangers of depleted uranium from US armaments used in the recent Balkan conflict. [90362]

Mr. George Robertson: I have been asked to reply.

The UNHCR is the lead agency responsible for the return of refugees to Kosovo. We have passed to them a copy of the March 1999 paper "Testing For The Presence of Depleted Uranium in Veterans of the Gulf Conflict" which contains information which may be useful to them. We stand ready to provide them with whatever advice they judge necessary to help them complete their tasks. I should stress however that health risks from depleted uranium have been assessed as low.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90681]

Mr. Vaz: Two of the Lord Chancellor's non-departmental public bodies have been disbanded since 1 May 1997: the Supreme Court Rule Committee and the County Court Rule Committee were disbanded on 26 April 1999. Their functions have been transferred to the Civil Procedure Rule Committee. That Rule Committee and the Civil Justice Council, which were both provided for by the Civil Procedure Act 1997, were set up after 1 May 1997.

Under the provisions of the Access to Justice Bill, the Legal Aid Board and the Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct would both be disbanded within the next 12 months, but their functions will be included in the functions of their replacement bodies, respectively the Legal Services Commission and the Legal Services Consultative Panel.

Three of the Advisory Committees on Justices of the Peace have been amalgamated into one committee.

Non-departmental public bodies are listed in the Cabinet Office Publication "Public Bodies". The Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and to ensuring that those which remain are open, accountable and effective. Many of the new NDPBs established across Whitehall since 1 May are essential in helping the Government deliver their Manifesto commitments.

Departmental Vehicles

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list for (a) his Department and (b) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register, how many vehicles are currently (i) owned and (ii) leased; if he will indicate their (1) fuel types and (2) engine cubic capacities; how many of the vehicles due for replacement by (A) his Department and (B) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register will be replaced in (x) 1999–2000, (y) 2000–01 and (z) 2001–02 by vehicles using (a1) petrol, (b2) diesel, (c3) natural gas, (d4) electric batteries and (e5) other; and how much his Department plans to spend in each year on vehicle replacements. [90692]

Mr. Vaz: The information requested is as follows:

For the financial year 1999–2000, we expect the cost of replacing vehicles to be £1,795,000; of the vehicles to be replaced, 166 will be diesel fuelled and four will be petrol fuelled. For subsequent years, the decision on how much the Department plans to spend each year on vehicle replacements and, what means of fuel the replacement cars will have, will be made in light of the best environmental advice available and in accordance with our Green Transport Plan.

Court Welfare Services

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the decision on the merger of the Official Solicitor, Guardian Ad Litem and Family Court Welfare will be finalised and the decision will be communicated to the relevant parties. [91939]

Mr. Vaz: Ministers and officials have been considering the key issues arising from last year's inter-departmental consultation paper on the future organisation of court welfare services. Discussions are proceeding and a decision is expected shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he has received from Sainsbury's plc about the levels of herbicide residue present in GM soya. [90723]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Perhaps the hon. Member will write to me regarding his concerns and specifying the herbicides he is referring to.

Food and Drink Inspections

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement explaining the total amount spent by the EU on the disposal of fruit and vegetables in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and if he will list the tonnage of each particular fruit and vegetable so disposed of. [90422]

Mr. Rooker [pursuant to the reply, 14 July 1999, c. 265]: The Government have no wish to see good food go to waste and have consistently opposed the system of paying compensation for produce withdrawn from the market, arguing that it distorts the market and encourages surpluses. The reform of the EU fruit and vegetable regime in 1996 was a step in the right direction, providing for reductions in withdrawal prices and volumes withdrawn over the first six years of the reform. The reform also encouraged greater use of free distribution to charities and other non-profit making institutions. A considerable amount of produce withdrawn in the UK has been distributed to such bodies in the past year. In addition, it is hoped that it will be possible to distribute fruit to schools in the coming season, following a recent change in the rules which allows transport costs to be claimed.

Provisional quantities of each product withdrawn in the EU during the 1997–98 marketing years:

	Tonnes
Cauliflowers	172,928
Apricots	16,965
Nectarines	72,688

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Pre-school Places

Mr. Patrick Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many extra pre-school places he plans to make available for three year olds next year. [89536]

Ms Hodge: The 57 Local Education Authorities receiving funding for three-year-olds for the autumn 1999 and spring 2000 terms have indicated that they can secure around 48,000 new free places for three year olds. From April 2000, further funding will be distributed across all Local Education Authorities. We are committed to ensuring that 66 per cent. of three year-olds have a free nursery place by 2002.

Parental Choice

Miss Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures the Government are taking to increase parental choice in education. [90371]

Ms Estelle Morris: Parents mainly exercise their right to parental choice when expressing a preference as to the school they would like for their child's education. The Government have ensured that local education authorities have a statutory duty to have regard to the principle that pupils should be educated in accordance with the wishes of their parents as far as possible.

The Code of Practice on School Admissions confirms the need for: parents to be given sufficient information for informed choice; clear and objective admission arrangements; simple admission procedures with the minimum of bureaucracy; and an effective statutory right of appeal.

The Greenwich judgment of 1989 has given many parents greater opportunity for choice as to their child's school. The funding we are providing to LEAs to meet our infant class size pledge for 5, 6 and 7 year olds will mean that more parents will achieve their first choice of school and will also result in 12,000 extra places at popular schools. And we have ensured, in the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, that appeal panels will be visibly independent of those who took the original decision not to admit a child, giving parents greater confidence to pursue appeals.

School Sports

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the proportion of schools' budgets spent on sport or PE The Minister for School Standards, [90782]

Ms Estelle Morris: Budget data for estimating the cost of providing sport and PE in schools are not held centrally.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much was spent by each local education authority on promoting sport or PE in schools in the last year for which figures are available. [90780]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on spending to promote sport and PE in schools is not held centrally.

Laboratory Teaching

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what reports he has received from Ofsted on the need for improvement in the laboratory teaching of (a) physics, (b) chemistry, (c) biology, (d) environmental sciences and (e) other sciences in the past two years; and if he will make a statement. [91281]

Ms Estelle Morris: The teaching of science subjects in secondary schools is referred to in several of the reports published by Ofsted during the past two years, including HM Chief Inspector's annual reports for 1996–97 and 1997–98, Secondary Education 1993–97, and Standards in the Secondary Curriculum 1997–98.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the research which he has evaluated in the past two years into the provision of laboratory science teaching in (a) England and Wales, (b) the USA and (c) European countries; and if he will make a statement. [91287]

Ms Estelle Morris: The only relevant research commissioned by the Department is "Labour Market for Engineering, Science and IT Graduates: Are there Mismatches between Supply and Demand?" which covers briefly some aspect of science teaching in schools. The research was carried out by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, and was published in June 1999.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to develop technical assistance for teachers in school scientific laboratories. [91283]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government announced in their Green Paper on Teachers their intention to provide funding to increase the number of teaching assistants by 20,000 full-time posts (or equivalent) by 2002. Schools, as employers, may wish to use some of these posts for the provision of technical assistance to teachers of Science in schools.

Science Teachers

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the range of qualifications held by those teaching science at (a) GCSE level and (b) A-level; and if he will make a statement. [91277]

Ms Estelle Morris: Details of the amount of science tuition time taught at GCSE and A-level for the academic year 1996–97 and the qualifications of the teachers are given in tables 17 and 18 of the DfEE Statistical Bulletin '1996–97 Secondary Schools Curriculum and Staffing Survey', a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

The Government have taken steps to encourage graduates with maths and science qualifications to become teachers. Following the introduction of financial incentives, applications to take Postgraduate Certificates in Education to deliver science are up by 24 per cent. on this time last year and for mathematics the increase is 37 per cent.

Departmental Policy

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to review the arrangements for issuing correspondence setting out departmental policy in his name from his Parliamentary Office. [91670]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend has no plans for such a review.

Assisted Places

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children are in receipt of an assisted place. [91669]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are 29,795 assisted place holders in England in the current academic year 1998–99.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average cost of (a) an assisted place and (b) an assisted place to age 13 years according to the most recent figures. [91673]

Ms Estelle Morris: The average cost of an assisted place in the current academic year 1998–99 is £4,145. Since the fees charged for the great majority of assisted place holders aged between 11 and 18 are similar across the age range, and almost 95 per cent. of assisted pupils are in that range, the average cost of a place to age 13 is estimated to be of a similar order to that for the scheme as a whole.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children in receipt of an assisted place due to end in the summer term of 1999 are attending the junior school of an all through school. [91674]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are estimated to be about 230 children in the junior departments of all through schools whose assisted places will end at the close of the current academic year.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils in receipt of an assisted place (a) applied for and (b) received an extension of their assisted place under Section 2(2)(6) of the Education (Schools) Act 1997; and in each case how many related to an extension to (i) age 13 and (ii) beyond age 13 years. [91671]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have received 343 applications for extension and approved 189 of them. 152 of the applications related to an extension to age 13, and 191 were for an extension beyond that age. Of the 189 cases approved, 117 related to an extension to age 13, and 72 were for an extension beyond age 13.

CABINET OFFICE

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90674]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Since 1 May 1997, Cabinet Office Ministers have abolished three NDPBs: the Citizen's Charter Panel of Advisers; the Deregulation Task Force; and the People's Panel Advisory Group. No Cabinet Office NDPB is due to be abolished over the next twelve months and none has had its functions transferred or has been renamed. A list of all NDPBs currently sponsored by the Cabinet Office is published on the Internet (www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/quango).

The Cabinet Office has set up three new NDPBs since 1 May 1997: the Better Regulation Task Force; the People's Panel Advisory Group; and the Security Vetting Appeals Panel. The People's Panel Advisory Group was only in existence for a short time and was abolished on 1 July 1999.

The Cabinet Office currently sponsors ten NDPBs, although the Minister for the Cabinet Office is also responsible for a COI-Sponsored NDPB and for seventeen NDPBs sponsored by the Duchy of Lancaster Office. The Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and to ensuring that those that remain are open, accountable and effective.

Anti-drugs Strategy

Mr. Field: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the allocation of funds is for programmes that have been announced as part of the Government's £217 million anti-drugs strategy. [91441]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government provided additional funding of £217 million over three years as a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review. The following table shows allocations to increase participation in programmes to improve health and break the links between drugs and crime. The breakdown is as follows:

£ million

SOCIAL SECURITY

Carers' Benefits

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of allowing credited National Insurance contributions by carers in receipt of invalid care allowance to be included in determining entitlement for contribution based on jobseeker's allowance, when the caring responsibilities of the carer come to an end. [90769]

Angela Eagle: The net cost of allowing credited National Insurance contributions by carers in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance to be treated as earnings in determining entitlement to Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) is estimated at around £3 million at April 1999 benefit rates.

Note:

Estimate rounded to nearest £1 million.

Child Support Agency (Birkenhead)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many complaints have been received by the Birkenhead CSA in each month since May 1997; how complaints are classified; and what proposals (a) have been implemented and (b) are proposed to reduce the number of complaints. [91258]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Mrs. Faith Boardman to Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas, dated 19 July 1999:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency Centre at Birkenhead.

The annex to this letter contains 2 tables. Table 1 is arranged to readily allow month on month comparisons of the number of complaints received from May 1997. Table 2 shows the general classification of complaint and for your information I have included the percentages for the last complete financial year.

Birkenhead Child Support Agency Centre (CSAC) has introduced a number of initiatives to improve customer service and reduce complaints which I have listed below. Many of these have been implemented nationally and others are local improvements.

Extending the opening hours of Client Helpline—now open 8.00am-8.30pm Mon-Fri and 9.00am-5.00pm Saturday.

Decision-Making and Appeals (DMA)—a more direct and responsive service to address client concerns. Simplifies the procedures for clients to report changes to the Agency. The emphasis of the new scheme is to enable parents to have direct telephone contact to discuss their case, wherever possible with the person who has actually been dealing with it.

Direct Telephone Numbers—staff are giving out their direct telephone numbers to customers. This ensures that clients can contact their case officer when needed to discuss their case and to resolve queries. Personal explanation of the decisions made in customer's cases should resolve the problems and queries of most parents.

Positive Customer Contact—the Agency is using the telephone as the primary means of contacting customers. This enables staff to gather information more quickly and to explain to clients the reason why information is needed. Customers are being contacted before a final calculation is made to ensure that the maintenance assessment is based on correct and up to date information. Customers are being contacted earlier by telephone at all stages of the process. This will reduce delays and aid in compliance. Staff in Birkenhead have received appropriate training.

Process Management Checks—team leaders have been given the freedom to target areas of work. In practice this means that cases are checked much earlier in the process to improve accuracy.

Face to Face—customers have always had the opportunity to speak to a member of the Agency's staff at their local child support office. However, in the past customers faced difficulties in arranging this. The Agency has committed approximately 600 staff (Wales and North West Business Unit has approximately 106) to face to face contact with its customers. This initiative is currently being rolled out nationally. Interviews can either be conducted at the local child support office or the customer's home.

Contacts with local stakeholders such as CAB—Birkenhead CSAC has dedicated customer service telephone numbers for CAB, New Deal for Lone Parent Advisors and MP's. CAB, New Deal Advisors and MP's have been invited into the CSAC. CSA staff have visited CAB and New Deal Advisors in order to forge closer links.

Meetings with customers—forums have been held with MP's and Customers—two in Lancashire, one in Wales. Open meetings have been arranged where customers could raise issues and ask general questions. Customers were also given the opportunity to speak to individual CSA staff who took away their queries and responded to them.

Forces Focal Point—set up to meet the specified needs of Forces Personnel. A member of staff acts as liaison between the Business Unit and the various armed forces. A dedicated telephone number is available to forces welfare offices, the Police and Prison Service.

Closer working with Benefits Agency—BA staff are completing CSA forms on the initial visit. They are also advising customers on CSA procedures in order to promote understanding and to simplify the information-gathering process.

Customer Service Workshops—staff are attending a one day seminar in improving customer service.

Customer Service Focus Group—staff meet to discuss customer service improvement initiatives. This group has conducted a Root Cause Analysis of customer complaints and has been tasked with devising and implementing solutions to the common complaints in order to reduce numbers.

For the future Birkenhead and the rest of the Agency will continue to build on improvements already made.

Customer Service workshops are continuing and further meetings are being arranged with clients and MP's.

Staff will be attending BA stakeholder liaison meetings to foster good relations between CSA staff and stakeholder groups.

Staff will be given customer focused performance indicators which will encourage practices which meet the needs of our customers.

A programme of visits, talks and surgeries is planned by the Forces Focal Point for police welfare staff, prison officers and armed forces personnel.

All computer generated notifications will provide the direct telephone number of an officer dealing with a client's case.

On 1 July the Secretary of State announced the publication of the White paper which sets out the plans for Child Support reform. In the long-term, with a simplified scheme, benefits from DMA, focus on customer service and a new computer system, the number of complaints about CSA should reduce significantly.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Pensions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the amount of money which would need to be credited to a stakeholder pension in a given year for a new entrant to the labour market to buy on retirement a pension equivalent to the value of the credit to the state second pension which would be given to someone with caring responsibilities during that year. [91136]

Mr. Timms: A carer who received a full year of credits for the State Second Pension in 2002 (the first year in which credits for the State Second Pension are likely to be available) would accrue rights to a pension of about £1 per week in today's prices, which rises in line with average earnings over the working life. This real rise in the value of the pension over the working life means that the cash value of the future pension accrued in 2002 will rise to approximately £2 per week in 1999 prices by the time of retirement (2051).

The amount a 16-year-old female entrant to the labour market in the same year would need to contribute to a stakeholder pension scheme to accrue the same pension in 2051 is £402 in 2002 (or about £8 per week) and about £6 per week net of tax relief at the basicrate.

Depending on earnings, part of this contribution could be made up of the National Insurance rebate if she was contracted-out of the State Second Pension.

The precise amounts required in a stakeholder pension to match the value of State Second Pension credits vary depending on the year in which the contribution is made and on the gender of the contributor.

Notes:

1. All figures are rounded to the nearest pound.
2. Figures are expressed in 1999 prices.
3. The annuity rate used is GAD's projected female annuity rate for 2050.
4. The real rate of return on Stakeholder funds is assumed to be 4 per cent.
5. An annual charge of 1 per cent. on the accumulated stakeholder fund is assumed.
6. Contributions are assumed to be gross; they would attract tax relief of 23 per cent.
7. The State Second Pension entitlement is calculated on the basis that a carer will gain a pension equivalent to that which would be accrued on £180 per week (in 1999 earnings terms) over the year.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 2 July 1999, Official Report, column 307, on pensions, how many claims for pension payments were not processed (a) within 20 days and (b) within 60 days and, of those not processed within 60 days, what was (i) the average time and (ii) the longest time, for processing in the 12 months up to 31 May. [91482]

Mr. Timms: The administration of Retirement Pensions is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. Peter Mathison to Mr. Laurence Robertson, dated 16 July 1999:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent question, pursuant to his answer of 2nd July on pensions, how many claims for pension payments were not processed (a) within 20 days and (b) within 60 days and, of those not processed within 60 days, what was (i) the average time and (ii) the longest time, for processing in the 12 months up to 31st May.

The table below sets out the number of Retirement Pension claims which, in the 12 months ending May 1999, had not been processed within 20 days and 60 days of their receipt:

Month	Claims not processed within 20 days	Claims not processed within 60 days	Total claims processed within month	Total claims received within month
June 1998	16,007	3,338	49,068	55,605
July 1998	11,607	2,989	40,412	50,176
August 1998	9,305	2,589	33,421	42,988
September 1998	14,227	6,208	42,269	50,224
October 1998	25,374	7,572	62,646	51,318
November 1998	12,821	3,867	50,460	48,612
December 1998	6,536	1,894	35,880	36,672

February 1999	10,661	2,316	45,725	50,980
March 1999	14,537	2,763	52,823	62,949
April 1999	[2]—	2,394	46,682	54,025
May 1999	[2]—	2,454	46,152	49,308

[1] Figures not available
[2] No longer maintained

As mentioned in the previous reply, in the 10 months up to 31 March 1999 the Benefits Agency target of processing 65% of its claims within 20 days was met in all but one of the months. Since April, the target has been 95% processed in 60 days and for April and May the percentages achieved were 94.9 and 94.7 respectively.

Information on the average time taken to process claims is taken across all the claims processed including those processed over 60 days. All claims are recorded on the Pensions Computer System and in respect of those not processed after 60 days, the system notifies the local Benefits Agency office management on a monthly basis to allow progress on the claims to be monitored. Management is also informed of the longest case outstanding but the cost in establishing which is the longest outstanding case across the network of offices in the 12 months ending May 1999 is disproportionate to the effort involved.

I hope this is helpful.

Pensioners (Income Support)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the Green Paper, "A New Contract for Welfare: Partnership in Pensions", and with regard to the take-up of Income Support by pensioners, (1) if his Department has started to trigger claims automatically at points where pensioners are likely to become entitled; [91925]

(2) if his Department brought forward proposals to identify pensioners who are entitled and to encourage them to claim, in accordance with the stated timetable; [91926]

(3) if his Department met his stated timetable of pinpointing more accurately those who may be entitled by April. [91924]

Mr. Timms: Work is continuing in all three areas. We will bring forward our proposals in due course.

Housing Benefit (Chelmsford)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many successful claims there were for housing benefit in the Chelmsford local authority area broken down by tenants of (a) council houses, (b) housing associations and (c) the private sector in May of each year since 1994. [91920]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the following table:

Number of cases by tenancy type from May 1994 to May 1998
Chelmsford Local Authority

Quarter	Local authority	Housing association	Private sector
May 1994	5,240	650	1,360

May 1996	4,910	920	1,350
May 1997	4,750	950	1,230

Family Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if there is a maximum number of child allowances an individual claimant can receive in family credit; and if there will be one in the working families tax credit. [91326]

Angela Eagle: Provided the entitlement conditions are satisfied, there is no maximum number of child credits that an individual claimant can receive in family credit, nor will there be any limit in the working families' tax credit.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90677]

Mr. Bayley: Of the 15 non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) sponsored by this Department on 1 May 1997, none has been disbanded; six will be disbanded in the next 12 months; one has had its functions transferred; none has been renamed but continues to perform a similar role; and 14 have been unchanged.

No new NDPBs have been established since 1 May 1997 and this Department is currently responsible for the 14 NDPBs detailed in Public Bodies 1998.

The six NDPBs to be disbanded in the next 12 months will be Central Adjudication Services, Child Support Appeal Tribunals, Disability Appeal Tribunals, Medical Appeal Tribunals, Social Security Appeal Tribunals and Vaccine Damage Tribunals.

Responsibility for the Women's National Commission has been transferred to Cabinet Office.

The Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and to ensuring that those which remain are open, accountable and effective.

TREASURY

Debt Relief

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on (a) progress made on the second phase of the highly indebted poor countries review, with specific reference to enhanced structural adjustment facility and (b) how the Government intend to link debt relief and poverty eradication. [90508]

Ms Hewitt: The Köln Summit made clear that the link between debt relief and poverty reduction should be strengthened.

The UK has put forward its own proposals for strengthening that link. Among other things, the UK has suggested that:

i. Debt relief should be structured both to provide resources for anti-poverty programmes, and to revive business confidence. This requires a balance between debt stock reduction and debt service reduction in the early years. To achieve this:
The World Bank and IMF should put forward a menu of options for achieving the required net present value reduction in their debt, taking into account the overall time profile of a country's debt service and creditor procedures;
This menu should include an option which reduces multilateral debt service by 50–75 per cent. in early years, and another with as much stock reduction as possible;
The indebted country should then be able to negotiate around these options.

ii. Debt relief should provide an opportunity to invigorate the entire government anti-poverty programme. It should not be seen as funding a separate, add-on operation. This anti-poverty programme should be informed by the World Bank and UN's work on social principles, and by the thinking around the Comprehensive Development Framework. It should incorporate a medium-term expenditure framework for the whole budget. Macro policy—and hence ESAF—should be an integral part. It should be as widely owned as possible. Hence, the anti-poverty plan needs to be built on existing processes in-country, rather than on an international blueprint. Although final agreement on IFI support for the programmes should continue to rest with countries and Bank/Fund Boards, other main players should have the opportunity to feed their comments in directly on final drafts before they go to the Boards.

The UK's proposals are included in a paper which has been sent to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund as part of phase II of the HIPC review. Copies are available in the Libraries of both Houses and on the Treasury's website (www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/docs/1999/hipc2.html).

Financial Services Authority

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of how the provisions in the document, "Freedom of Information: Consultation on Draft Legislation", Cm 3455, would affect the operation of the Financial Services Authority; and if he will make a statement. [91253]

Ms Hewitt: It is intended that the FSA should be subject to the Freedom of Information legislation and the implications of the proposed provisions for the FSA's operations are being considered. The FSA will be submitting their response to the Home Office consultations exercise in due course.

Insurance Industry (Solvency Ratios)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many occasions in each of the last five years his Department has been notified that insurance providers have been in breach of the required solvency ratios; and what corrective action his Department took. [90935]

Ms Hewitt: Neither the Financial Services Authority (FSA), as contractor for the Treasury, nor the Department of Trade and Industry, as the Department previously responsible, maintains systematic information on notifications of such.

The Insurance Companies Act 1982 provides for the authorisation and prudential supervision of companies carrying out insurance business in the United Kingdom. All UK authorised insurance companies are required to maintain a margin of solvency. If it appears that an authorised insurance firm has failed to maintain the required margin, it may be required to implement a plan or scheme for restoring a sound financial position. In the last five years, these requirements have been exercised as follows:

Year	Cases
1994	11
1995	5
1996	5
1997	3
1998	5

Source:
Insurance Annual Reports; published by The Stationery Office

Additional action may be taken, depending on the circumstances of the case and the perceived risk to policyholders.

Pesticide Tax

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of (a) farms which may become unprofitable and (b) jobs which may be lost if a pesticide tax is introduced. [91152]

Ms Hewitt: No decision has been taken on whether to introduce a tax on the use of pesticides.

Research commissioned by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on a possible tax or charge on pesticides was published on 24 March focusing on various design options for a charge scheme or tax, and attempting to evaluate the potential impact. Views were invited on the issues raised in the research and this consultation exercise closed on 24 June. The Government will consider the findings of the research project and the views expressed in the consultation exercise in deciding how best to proceed.

Premium Bonds

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much income, or deemed income, is received from premium bonds per annum; and what percentage of this income is paid out in prizes. [91276]

Ms Hewitt: Money saved in Premium Bonds forms part of the Government's funding programme; as such no income is generated from them. The return to savers is in the form of the chance to win tax free prizes each month.

The monthly prize fund is calculated by applying a variable notional rate of interest, currently 3.25 per cent. per annum, to the number of eligible bonds.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people, and what percentage of the population, held premium bonds in (a) 1979, (b) 1989 and (c) 1999; and what was the average holding. [91402]

Ms Hewitt: The number of holdings, percentage of the population holding Premium Bonds and the average holding are shown in the following table.

Date	Number of holdings (millions)	Percentage of population	Average holdings (£)
March 1979	25.5	44.5	56
March 1989	24.2	42.2	95
March 1999	23.0	38.8	559

Royal Mint

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he will be taking to ensure that the new freedom being given to the Royal Mint to enter into the manufacture of jewellery and other non-coin products will not lead to unfair competition with private sector manufacturers. [91688]

Ms Hewitt: Proposals from the Royal Mint to expand their business in ways which require any change to the Trading Fund Order which currently restricts the Royal Mint's activities will be considered on their merits, taking into account both the viability of the proposals and any wider implications for competition. If agreed, a new Trading Fund Order would be laid before Parliament.

Prince Programme

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason vulnerable sectors of the population are targeted in the Prince Programme information campaign. [91873]

Ms Hewitt: The Prince Programme includes a series of projects with the aim of facilitating the changeover to the euro among vulnerable sectors of the population. These vulnerable groups are being targeted because they have special information requirements.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will answer the letter from the right hon. Member for Wells to the Chief Secretary, sent on 27 April, about the reduction in the European Budget Rebate. [91901]

WALES

Statutory Instruments

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of statutory instruments introduced by his Department into Parliament in (a) 1998, (b) 1992, (c) 1985 and (d) 1973 had the European Union as their legislative source. [89170]

Mr. Michael: The need to use different record sources for different periods has meant that some figures include local statutory instruments while others include only general instruments. Also we have only been able to identify instruments complying with EU obligations as those made under the European Communities Act 1972. Subject to these limitations, the following information is offered.

1998—292 SIs (includes local SIs—approximately 70)—15 cite European Communities Act 1972, s2(2), as enabling legislation.

1992—382 SIs (includes local SIs but no figures readily available for number of local SIs—2 cite European Communities Act 1972, s2(2), as enabling legislation.

1985—135 SIs (excludes local SIs)—3 cite European Communities Act 1972, s2(2), as enabling legislation.

1973—85 SIs (excludes local SIs)—8 cite European Communities Act 1972, s2(2), as enabling legislation.

Note:

These figures are for all SIs made by the Secretary of State for Wales, whether individually or in conjunction with an English Minister.

Secretary of State's Office

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the running costs of the Secretary of State's Office for 1999–2000. [89856]

Mr. Michael: I have made budgetary provision of £2 million.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had on proposals for reform of the financial and organisational structures of further education colleges. [89853]

Mr. Hain: This is a matter for the National Assembly for Wales.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many parliamentary questions were tabled to his Department for written answer on a named day between May 1997 and 14 April 1999; and what percentage of them received a substantive response on that named day. [91061]

Mr. Michael: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 336.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for (a) his Department and (b) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register, how many vehicles are currently (i) owned and (ii) leased; if he will indicate their (A) fuel types and (B) engine cubic capacities; and how many of the vehicles due for replacement by (a) his Department and (b) associated bodies listed in the National Asset Register will be replaced in (i) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02 and will be replaced by vehicles using (1) petrol, (2) diesel, (3) natural gas, (4) electric batteries and (5) other; and how much his Department expects to spend in each year on vehicle replacements. [90797]

Mr. Michael: Vehicles used by my Department area supplied by the Government Car Service (GCS) which is the responsibility of the Cabinet Office.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90795]

Mr. Michael: Since May 1997, no new non-departmental public bodies have been established, eight have been disbanded and 37 remain in existence. Several of these are technical or professional bodies rather than "quangos" in the normally accepted sense of that term. Future decisions will be a matter for the National Assembly for Wales. The specific organisations referred to are set out in the following list:

(a) Since 1 May 1997 the following non-departmental public bodies have been disbanded:

the Agricultural Advisory Panel for Wales, (May 1997);

(b) It is now a matter for the Assembly to decide whether further bodies will be disbanded.

(c)(i) The Development Board for Rural Wales and the Land Authority for Wales were disbanded and their functions transferred to the Welsh Development Agency.

(ii) Responsibility for the Residuary Body for Wales' remaining properties was passed on to Caerphilly County Borough Council. The functions of Tain Cymru have passed to the Welsh Office and latterly the National assembly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Council how many hon. Members have claimed a bicycle allowance since its introduction. [91271]

Mrs. Beckett: Four hon. Members have claimed the bicycle allowance since its introduction.

Hon. Members' Cars

Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Council how many hon. Members' cars were registered as being within each engine size capacity for which records are held in (a) May 1998 and (b) May 1999. [91272]

Mrs. Beckett: The information requested is not held as at May 1998 and May 1999 and could be produced only at disproportionate cost by an extensive clerical exercise.

The relevant details as at 31 March are available:

Engine capacity	March 1998	March 1999
Up to 1300cc	109	92
1301cc to 2300cc	519	530
2301cc and above	324	292

Disabled Access

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what plans there are further to improve disabled access to the Palace of Westminster. [91776]

Sir Sydney Chapman: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 9 March 1998, Official Report, column 37. If the hon. Member has a specific proposal for any further improvement, the Director of Works would be pleased to consider it.

TREASURY

Tax Credits

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he had made of the effect of paying a benefit directly through the pay-packet as a tax credit on incentives and behaviour. [90146]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 8 July 1999]: No benefits are currently paid as tax credits. The Government have, however, already announced that the new Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit will be paid through the pay packet from April 2000. This will demonstrate the link between reward and work, encourage take-up, and improve work incentives.

VAT

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to lay the Value Added Tax (Sport, Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1999; and if he will make a statement. [92280]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government laid the Order today. It will come into effect on 1 January 2000 and stop VAT avoidance by profit-making sports clubs, by laying down conditions for exemption from VAT which any non-profit making club can satisfy.

Royal Mint

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the performance targets for the Royal Mint for 1999–2000. [92281]

Ms Hewitt: I have set the Royal Mint the target of achieving a rate of return on average net assets of 14.6 per cent. for 1999–2000 which is an increase over the target of 14.3 per cent. set for 1998–99.

The Royal Mint's other performance targets have also been tightened. The new targets are for:

96 per cent. of accepted orders from UK banks and the Post Office for UK circulating coin to be delivered within 11 working days;

95 per cent. of UK collector coin orders from individual UK customers to be delivered within 25 days;

97 per cent. of medals orders to be delivered by the agreed delivery date;

99.7 per cent. of collector products accepted by individual UK customers.

New Deal (Young People)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals his Department has recruited under the New Deal for Young People. [91892]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) on 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 116.

Gold Sales

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's policy relating to gold sales; and if he will estimate the job losses there (a) have been and (b) will be in third world countries which produce gold, with particular reference to South Africa. [91879]

Ms Hewitt: As they will be spread out over a number of years, UK gold sales will be modest in the context of the world gold market. The 125 tonnes to be sold this year amounts to around 5 per cent. of estimated annual mining supply and less than a tenth of 1 per cent. of IMF estimates of above ground stocks of gold. Sales on this scale are unlikely to have a significant sustained impact on the price of gold.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of reducing NI contributions by 0.5 per cent. [91648]

Dawn Primarolo: Reducing the National Insurance Contributions rates for employees, the self-employed and employers by 0.5 per cent. would cost about £2.9 billion in 2000–01.

Data Series

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new data series separated by gender, race, disability and age have been commissioned by his Department since June 1997. [90826]

Ms Hewitt: HM Treasury has not commissioned any new internal data series separated by gender, race, disability and age since June 1997. However, the Department has long-established procedures for routinely monitoring staff in post numbers and the outcome of recruitment, promotion and appraisal exercises by gender and race. In addition, an Equality Audit of the posting, appraisal and promotion procedures, by gender and race, will be undertaken later this year.

HM Customs and Excise has not carried out any national internal surveys, but several surveys have been carried out locally. Customs is also considering carrying out a national survey in the near future.

The Inland Revenue has not completed a full Departmental internal staff survey separated by gender, race, disability and age since June 1997. However, a full Departmental survey is currently being issued to everyone in the Department. The survey will concentrate on human resource issues such as training and development, motivation, equality and impressions of the Revenue as an employer. Survey respondents are invited to state their sex, ethnicity, if they have a disability as defined by the Disability Discrimination Act, their age and if they work part-time or full-time. Key results of the survey will be made available to everyone in the Department.

A disability survey will be taken forward later this year. As part of the survey everyone in the Department will be asked to state if they have any disabilities and the nature of those disabilities.

The Revenue routinely monitors issues such as performance management results and staff in posts by band (grade) separated by gender, race, disability, part-time and full-time and since 1998, by age. The Revenue is in the process of monitoring vacancy filling by gender, race, disability, part-time and full-time and age.

National Savings monitors its external recruitment to ensure there are no biases, but has carried out no internal surveys since June 1997 on gender, race, disability or age.

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) routinely collects information from all applicants for jobs on gender, race and disability. Information about age is collected from those who take up posts. Internally it publishes annual information about performance marks by gender, ethnic origin and disability.

In June of this year, all ONS staff were asked to complete a questionnaire about disability. The results of this are being analysed at present. At the same time, staff who had not previously declared their ethnic origin were asked to do so.

District Banks

Mr. Salter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had from (i) consumer organisations and (ii) organisations representing (a) the elderly, (b) the disabled and (c) the visually impaired, regarding the closure and automation of district banks in (1) rural and (2) urban communities; and what responses he has made. [91695]

Ms Hewitt: Representations have been received from a number of organisations concerned about consumer interests. The Treasury's Policy Action Team's Report on "Access to Financial Service" is likely to be published in the autumn.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Student Grants

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reasons the software to carry out financial assessments for student grant applications has not been supplied to local education authorities to date. [92090]

Mr. Mudie: The three software companies used by most local education authorities have released the final version of their software to those LEAs. Those authorities are now finalising financial assessments for students who applied by the established deadlines so that they will receive cheques at the start of their courses. The remaining LEAs have their own in-house software provision or manual systems.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance his Department has issued to students who do not receive their grant by the first day of term. [92089]

Mr. Mudie: None. We expect all students who have applied to the required timetable to receive cheques on the first day of their course, and are making plans to ensure that even very late applicants receive a payment upon arrival at their universities and colleges.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment under what circumstances students are entitled to apply for compensation in relation to delays in the processing of their applications for a grant. [92093]

Mr. Mudie: There are arrangements for students to make complaints if they are not satisfied with the processing of their applications for student support. However, we expect all students who have applied to the required timetable to receive cheques on the first day of their course, and are making plans to ensure that late applicants also receive a payment upon arrival at their universities and colleges.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many local education authorities are expected to complete assessments for student grants using the new systems, in accordance with his Department's timetable. [92091]

Mr. Mudie: We expect that all local education authorities will complete processing applications from students who submitted their forms by the required timetable, and that cheques will be issued to those students at the start of their courses.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of local education authorities which will have completed the processing of applications for student grants before the start of the university term. [92092]

Mr. Mudie: The Department is monitoring closely the progress being made by local education authorities. We expect that they will all complete processing applications from students who submitted their forms by the required timetable, and that cheques will be issued to those students at the start of their courses.

Holocaust Remembrance Day

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his Department's involvement in the proposed Government committee on Holocaust Remembrance Day. [92160]

Mr. Mudie: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 19 July 1999, Official Report, column 400.

Public Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the non-departmental public bodies in existence on 1 May 1997 that (a) have been disbanded, indicating when they were disbanded, (b) will be disbanded in the next 12 months, (c) have had their functions transferred to (i) another non-departmental public body and (ii) a democratically elected body, (d) have been renamed but continue to perform a similar role and (e) have been unchanged; if he will indicate in (c)(ii) the relevant successor body; what new non-departmental public bodies have been established since 1 May 1997; and how many non-departmental public bodies his Department currently is responsible for. [90678]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 19 July 1999]: Of the non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) in existence on 1 May 1997:

(a) the NDPB that has been simply disbanded is the Supported Employment Consultative Group, in June 1998 as intended. The Centre for Information on Language Teaching and Research continues in operation but, following constitutional change, has been de-classified as an NDPB;

(b) the Funding Agency for Schools has ceased funding activities, and will be disbanded in the autumn of this year;

(c)(i) the functions of the disbanded National Advisory Council for the Employment of People with Disabilities have been transferred to the National Disability Council. The National Council for Vocational Qualifications and the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority have been merged to form the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority. The Race Relations Employment Advisory Group has been disbanded and replaced by the Race Relations Education and Employment Forum;

(c)(ii) no functions have been transferred to a democratically elected body;

(d) the Education Assets Board has been renamed as the Education Transfer Council and the National Council for Educational Technology has been renamed as the British Educational Communications and Technology Agency;

(e) unchanged NDPBs not mentioned above are the Construction Industry Training Board, the Engineering Construction Industry Training Board, the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Further Education Funding Council, the Higher Education Funding Council for England, Investors in People UK, Remploy Ltd., Student Loans Company, Teacher Training Agency, Registered Inspectors Appeals Tribunal, Special Educational Needs Tribunal, School Teachers Review Body now classified under this Department.

New NDPB established since 1 may 1997 are; the Disability Rights Task Force, New Deal Task Force, Skills Task Force.

The Department is responsible for 21 NDPBs.

The Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and to ensuring that those which remain are open, accountable and effective. Many of the NDPBs established since 1 May are essential in helping the Government deliver their Manifesto commitments.

Class Sizes

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children aged five to seven years in (a) Bath and North-East Somerset and (b) South Gloucestershire were in classes of 30 or fewer in each year from 1992 to date. [91155]

Ms Estelle Morris: The available information is shown in the table.

The Government have pledged to reduce infant class sizes so that no 5, 6 or 7-year-old is in an infant class of more than 30 pupils. The number of infants in classes larger than 30 has already been reduced by some 130,000 between January 1998 and January 1999.

Numbers of pupils in key stage 1 classes of 30 pupils or less taught by one teacher in maintained primary schools in Bath and North East Somerset and South Gloucestershire local education authority areas: January 1996–99 (provisional)

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which departments funded the Drive For Youth programme in the past four years; what were the reasons for this investment; what amount of public funds was allocated to this in each year; and if he will make a statement. [90300]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 8 July 1999]: Drive For Youth is a registered charity. Government funding is through payment for services provided through contracts for the delivery of training courses for New Deal and other clients by the Employment Service, TECs, LECs and other bodies. Many of these contracts are concluded at local level, and information is not held centrally, so full details could be ascertained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many kilometres have been travelled on her Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets her Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by her Department's employees; and if she will make a statement. [91028]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings and main buildings occupied by Executive Agencies should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

Northern Ireland Departments are working to complete plans covering all headquarters and main buildings and they are developing plans for all other key buildings in line with the targets set out in the White Paper, and consideration is being given to measures to reduce single-occupancy car use by employees.

Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when she expects to receive the fifth report of the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside; and if she will make a statement. [91254]

Notes:

1. Figures may be subject to minor amendment.
2. Figures cannot be attributed to specific paramilitary groupings.
3. The above may not be exhaustive as there may be some offences, e.g. armed robbery, which may be linked to paramilitary groups but they have been recorded under the category of offence and it is not possible to be more specific.

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list for (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 the number of (i) punishment beatings and (ii) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many in each category were committed by (1) Loyalist and (2) Republican groups. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many individuals her Department has recruited under the New Deal for Young People. [91897]

Mr. Paul Murphy: As at 30 June 1999 the information on the Northern Ireland Civil Service (including its Agencies) participating as employers in the New Deal is as follows:

Northern Ireland Civil Service

New Deal 'starts' since programme began	Number
Age 18–24	21
25 and over	12

I would also refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office to my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) on 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 116.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Departmental Travel

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many kilometres have been travelled on his Department's business in each of the last three years broken down by (a) foot, (b) bike, (c) bus, (d) train, (e) tram, (f) light-rail, (g) plane, (h) motorbike, (i) car, (j) taxi, (k) river-taxi and (l) other modes of transport; what plans and targets his Department has to reduce the kilometres travelled by private transport by his Department's employees; and if he will make a statement. [91019]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 13 July 1999]: The information on business travel is not collected in the form requested and therefore cannot be provided. As published in the Integrated Transport White Paper in July 1998, the Government have set a target that all Government Department headquarters buildings occupied by Executive Agencies and Government Offices for the Regions should have green transport plans by March 1999 and all other key buildings by March 2000.

We have completed a green transport plan covering all our headquarters and main buildings. Being located in central London, this Department is already well placed for staff commuting, with virtually all staff using public transport. Proposals therefore concentrate on discouraging business travel by private car by reviewing mileage rates, encouraging cycling, converting official vehicles to use cleaner fuels and reducing deliveries.

Lilleshall National Sports Centre

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what investment is planned in Lilleshall National Sports Centre to improve standards among British sports people. [91508]

Mr. Banks: Lilleshall National Sports Centre will be the part of the UK Sports Institute Network Centre serving the West Midlands. The Centre has a wide range of a sports specific and generic training facilities which include up to date gymnastics training facilities, natural and artificial turf pitches and indoor training halls.

The key services of sports science and medicine will be co-ordinated by the Lilleshall Sports Injury and Human Performance Centre, supported by Staffordshire and Worcester Institutes of Higher Education; Birmingham University will play a crucial role in both service and facility provision. A network of Sports Medicine practitioners will be established to provide primary care services and formal links will be established with hospitals to provide essential secondary and tertiary care for athletes.

Other sites will be incorporated into the regional network to complement the services available at Lilleshall and extend the range of sports available in the region.

The sports expected to be included within the West Midlands Network are:

archery athletics cricket football golf gymnastics hockey netball
squash
equestrian.

Around 200 elite, international and national athletes currently living in the west midlands will be able to use the services available.

Press Officer

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the criteria applied to the recruitment of his Department's new press officer; how many applicants there were for this post; how many were shortlisted; how this post was advertised; who was on the selection panel; and what salary this post carries. [91948]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 19 July 1999]: In selecting the Head of News for my Department in summer 1998 the following criteria were used: people management, resource management, ability to inspire confidence, ability to communicate with impact, ability to add value to decisions, and knowledge of the system. Thirty two candidates applied of which seven were shortlisted for interview, and five were actually interviewed. The post was advertised in The Guardian.

The selection panel comprised two members of the Management Board of the Department, a senior representative of the Government Information and Communication Service and a Civil Service Commissioner.

The post carries a salary in the range of £36,517 to £56,198.

HOME DEPARTMENT

MOD Police

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been received by the Police Complaints Authority against the Ministry of Defence Police in each year since they were granted statutory constabulary powers. [92165]

Mr. Boateng: I understand from the Police Complaints Authority that the number of complaints dealt with in respect of the Ministry of Defence Police since 1987 when they were granted statutory constabulary powers is as set out in the table:

Year	Number of complaints
1987	22
1988	93
1989	86
1990	225
1991	143
1992	75
1993	46
1994–95[1]	58
1995–96	75
1996–97	44
1997–98	53
1998–99	47

[1] Statistics have been kept on a financial year basis from 1994

Criminal Records Agency

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his planned timetable for the establishment of the Criminal Records Agency. [91988]

Mr. Boateng: I am reviewing the timetable for the implementation of the Criminal Records Bureau and will inform the House of the results when it returns after the recess.

UK Passport Agency

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment was made of the required level of staff which would be needed following introduction of the new information technology systems by the UK Passport Agency; if he will publish a summary of the Agency's report on staffing requirements; and if he will make a statement. [90686]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have placed a summary of the business case for Private Sector Involvement in the Issue of the British Passport, produced by the UK Passport Agency in July 1997, in the Library. Paragraph 49 gives an estimate of Agency staffing levels under the chosen option as 930 permanent staff equivalents. This was based on demand estimated at an average 4 million services a year across the 10 year period of the contracts.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the forecast number of passport applications to be made in (a) 1998 and (b) 1999; what was the actual number of applications in 1998; what is the current estimate of the number of applications for 1999; and if he will make a statement. [90591]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The UK Passport Agency forecasts the number of passport applications on the basis of financial years. The forecasts published in the Agency's 1998–2001 Corporate Plan were 4.5 million in 1998–99 and 5.0 million in 1999–2000.

During the year, the Agency revised its 1998–99 forecasts upwards from 4.5 million to 4.9 million to allow for a greater take up of children's passports than its statistical model forecast. In the event, the actual intake for 1998–99 was 4.8 million.

The Agency continues to analyse the impact on its forecast for 1999–2000 of its recent operational problems and the measures implemented as a result.

On available information, the Agency's latest forecast for 1999–2000 is for 5.2 million applications which again makes greater allowance for the effect of the child policy against the modelled 5.0 million.

Young Offenders Institution Feltham

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he and other Ministers in his Department have met the governor and senior management responsible for Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institution Feltham since May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [90580]

Mr. George Howarth: Ministers have visited Feltham Young Offender Institution on three occasions since May 1997 when they would have met the governor and staff. I visited Feltham in July 1997 and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary visited on 13 February 1998. My hon. Friend, the Member for Cardiff South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), in his capacity as Minister of State, Home Office, visited Feltham on 6 April 1998.

In addition, I met the governor on 26 May 1999 and the Minister for prisons and probation, Lord Williams, met the governor on 23 June 1999. Lord Williams has had meetings with the area manager on six occasions since February and the Home Secretary has met the area manager twice. Central records of attendance at office meetings are not available prior to this year.

These meetings were in addition to the regular meetings my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the Minister with responsibility for prisons, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams and until July 1998, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), held with the Director General.

Wormwood Scrubs

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he and other Ministers in his Department have met the governor and senior management responsible for HMP Wormwood Scrubs since May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [90579]

Mr. George Howarth: Since May 1997, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), the then Minister for prisons and probation, visited Wormwood Scrubs prison at night on 13 July 1998 when she would have met the governor and staff.

The current Minister for prisons and probation, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams, has met the governor on two occasions on 14 April and 22 June 1999. My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams, has also had meetings with the area manager on six occasions since February and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has met the area manager twice. Central records of attendance at office meetings are not available prior to this year.

These meetings were in addition to the regular meetings my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the Minister with responsibility for prisons, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams and until July 1998, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West, held with the Director General.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the actions his Department has taken in respect of each of the recommendations made by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on Her Majesty's Prison Wormwood Scrubs in March 1997. [90970]

Mr. George Howarth: I have arranged for a copy of the action plan drawn up in response to the Chief Inspector of Prison's recommendations, contained in his 1996 inspection report, to be placed in the Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Somalia

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures she intends to take to improve the situation in Somalia with regard to (a) food, (b) seeds and (c) health assistance. [91296]

Clare Short: To date, we have committed £590,000 to emergency needs, including support for UNICEF's supplementary feeding programmes in the Bardera region; Action Contre le Faim's (ACF) emergency nutritional intervention in the Gedo and Bakool regions; and World Vision's primary health care project in Juba. We are currently considering providing support for the African Medical and Research Foundation to improve the health of internally displaced people in Luuq Town, South West Somalia, which will complement ACF's activities. In addition, the EC have provided 10,899 metric tonnes of food.

We are closely monitoring the situation and will continue to respond to needs as they arise.

Water

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the projects supported by her Department for the provision of potable water. [91722]

Clare Short: The White Paper on International Development makes clear that fresh water resources are essential for sustaining life, development and the environment. Access to potable water, sanitation and hygiene education is vital to poor people's health and well-being. We ensure that our support for the provision of potable water is integrated with improved sanitation and hygiene education. With the increasing demands on limited fresh water resources, we are also working to ensure that water resources are managed in an integrated and sustainable way.

We are increasing commitments on water supply and sanitation projects. In all, we funded approximately 175 projects in 1998–99. Expenditure was £11 million on rural water supply and sanitation and £16 million on urban water supply and sanitation. In total, we spent £45 million in the water sector, including water resources management. Of this 52 per cent. was in Africa (notably, Ghana, Zimbabwe, South Africa, Kenya, Lesotho, Uganda and Tanzania); 39 per cent. in Asia (India, Nepal, Bangladesh, Pakistan, China) and the remaining 9 per cent. was spread between South America, Middle East and Eastern Europe.

Small Grants Budget

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the small grants budget; and if she will make a statement. [91713]

Clare Short: The overall objectives set out in the Government's White Paper on International Development apply to the Small Grants Scheme which finances projects generally costing a few thousand pounds. Reports are considered on a country by country basis each year, and compliance with administrative and financial requirements is monitored by my Internal Audit Department.

Sudan

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures she is taking to support the work of the World Food Programme in the Sudan. [92153]

Mr. Foulkes: The British Government committed £14.1 million through the World Food Programme (WFP) last year. This year, the situation is much improved. We have made available £5 million and have asked the UN Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), who are co-ordinating the UN system's humanitarian response in Sudan, to let us have their priorities, including those of WFP, for the use of this money.

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate the Commonwealth Development Corporation has made of the number of employees at (a) the (i) Abosso gold and (ii) Satellite gold fields in Ghana and (b) the East Africa gold mines in Tanzania. [92151]

Mr. Foulkes: Abosso gold and satellite gold fields in Ghana have, respectively, around 400 and 330 employees. The East Africa gold mines in Tanzania, where work is still in the exploration stage, has about 40 employees.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the current portfolio of Commonwealth Development Corporation investments together with the estimates of their current value and annual income. [92149]

Mr. Foulkes: The Commonwealth Development Corporation's (CDC) Report and Accounts for 1998 list all the enterprises in which CDC had debt or equity investments at 31 December 1998.

Information on the value and annual income of individual investments is commercially sensitive. In total, the cost of CDC's investments before provisions, as published in the Report and Accounts for 1998, was £1,520.6 million. Provisions of £319.2 million bring the net portfolio at cost less provision down to £1,201.4 million. These figures take no accounts of surpluses in value over cost on any of CDC's equity investments as CDC's accounts are based on the historic cost convention. However, as part of the process of moving towards valuation accounting, CDC valued its equity portfolio as at 31 December 1998 in accordance with the British Venture Capital Association guidelines and this showed an unrealised surplus in valuation of £99 million.

The group revenue account confirmed portfolio loan investment income of £105.0 million and portfolio equity investment income of £31.5 million, giving an annual investment income for 1998 at £136.5 million.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the firms which have provided advice to her Department on the Commonwealth Development Corporation and the public-private partnership process together with the fees paid to those advisers to date. [92150]

Mr. Foulkes: We have received advice on preparation of the Commonwealth Development Corporation (CDC) public private partnership from Credit Suisse First Boston (and before their merger, BZW) Allen and Overy, and PricewaterhouseCoopers. Information on fees paid to individual companies while work is in progress is commercially sensitive. In total, costs to the Department for financial and legal advice in preparation of the CDC public private partnership (including costs of advice from the Treasury Solicitors Department) totalled £1.6 million as at 30 June 1999.

Bangladesh

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to provide (a) loans and (b) other assistance to help (i) electrification and (ii) other projects in Bangladesh; what matters she discussed with the Bangladesh Prime Minister during his recent visit; and if she will make a statement. [91760]

Clare Short: Our development assistance for Bangladesh is provided on grant terms. We have given considerable support in the past to the Dhaka Electricity Supply Authority; however, we have no plans to make further investment until the high level of system losses has been tackled. Technical assistance has been offered on this issue. A new project has recently been agreed which aims to facilitate public/private partnerships. This will help in the power sector among others. This technical assistance will be geared primarily towards the establishment of appropriate legal and regulatory frameworks and the development, marketing and tendering of projects suitable for private sector participation.

We have a substantial development programme in Bangladesh, spending more than £65 million in 1998–99 on development projects, and on relief and rehabilitation activities following the floods of 1998. The programme has a strong emphasis on poverty reduction, in particular on primary health and education services, and help for sustainable livelihoods for the poor. Discussion with the Prime Minister of Bangladesh, Sheikh Hasina, focused on how to assist her Government's plans to improve public service management and target the needs of the poor.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Indonesia

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many export licences have been (a) requested, (b) granted and (c) revoked for arms to Indonesia since May 1997; and how many Hawk Fighter bombers were covered by these licences. [91215]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 13 July 1999]: Further to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Audrey Wise) on 2 July 1999, Official Report, columns 313–14, concerning licences issued between 2 May 1997 and 18 June 1999 for the export of military equipment to Indonesia; none of these licences covered the export of Hawk aircraft.

Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) routinely cover exports to a number of countries. Any country initially specified on an OIEL application but not included as a permitted destination on the licence is not recorded on the Export Control Organisation's computer databases. Accordingly, the number of applications for OIELs covering exports to any particular country could be established only by manual examination of the paper records of all of the applications made in the period, which would entail disproportionate cost.

Between 2 May 1997 and 18 June 1999, 114 applications were received for Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) covering the export to consignees or end-users in Indonesia of goods subject to export control by being listed in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, the so-called Military List. None of these applications covered Hawk aircraft. In the same period, no Standard or Open Individual Export Licences covering such exports were revoked.

Milk Marque

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what factors underlay the time taken to publish the report of the Competition Commission on Milk Marque. [91312]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained the position to the House. He said:

"It was not an easy decision, as it is not usual to disagree with a clear recommendation from the MMC. It is one reason why the report took longer to publish than I would have liked; I understand the concerns expressed by many right hon. and hon. Members this afternoon and by the farming community, particularly the dairy farmers, about the delay in its publication. I wanted to publish the report as soon as possible and I have done that. I would have liked it to be sooner, but I wanted to make sure when it was published and I had put on record my decision that all avenues had been properly investigated."—[Official Report, 7 July 1999, column 1091.]

Tidal Energy

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the size of community which would be served by a 100 MW tidal energy power plant. [91647]

Mr. Battle: A 100 MW tidal energy barrage might be expected to produce electricity equivalent to the annual consumption of 40,000 to 50,000 domestic customers assuming a capacity factor for the plant in the range 0.2 to 0.3 and average sales of 4,300 kWh/yr to domestic customers. While feasibility studies for such plants have been conducted in the UK no project is known to be in early prospect.
